There are some small State reservations in Maine, New York (including Long Island), Virginia, and South Carolina.

Indian reservations in Canada, especially in the western part, appear to have been formed for bands or minor divisions, seldom for entire tribes, and the land set apart was usually a small area, sometimes not exceeding 4 acres, due to the fact that the Indians were simply confirmed in possession of their residence tracts instead of being collected on reservations especially established for such purpose. These tracts appear to have been reserved in some instances in accordance with treaties, in some by special act of Parliament, in some by the decision of the military council, and in others by an Indian commissioner. Special names were usually given, but the reservations of each province or district were numbered. The reservations in the Dominion number several hundred. (C. T.)

Reservoirs. See Irrigation, Receptacles.

Resochiki (Res-o-chi'-ki, 'cave place'). The name of several small independent rancherias of the Tarahumare in Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Restigouche. An important Micmac village on the N. bank of Restigouche r., near its mouth, in Bonaventure co., Quebec. The French mission of Sainte Anne was established there in the 17th century. In 1884 the village contained 464 souls; in 1909, 498.

Rhaap. Given as the name of a subdivision of the Ntlakyapamuk residing on or near the middle course of Fraser r., Brit. Col., in 1880. The initial letter in the name is probably a misprint.

Rhombus. See Bull-roarer.

Rhyolite. A variously colored volcanic rock having a glassy ground-mass, extensively employed by the tribes of the Middle Atlantic states for making the larger varieties of flaked implements. It occurs in large bodies in South mtn. and other Eastern Slope ranges to the N. and S., where it is usually grayish, sometimes purplish-gray in color, and shows scattered whitish crystals of feldspar. Native quarries have been located on the mountain slope near Fairfield, Pa., and it is assumed that the countless implements of this material found throughout an extensive region to the S. and E. down to the Atlantic coast came largely from this source. Noteworthy in the distribution of these quarry products are numerous caches of long slender unspecialized blades ranging from a few specimens to two hundred or more. Consult Holmes in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 1897. (W. H. H.)

Ribnaia (Russian: 'fish'). A Chnagmiut Eskimo village on the right bank of the lower Yukon, Alaska; pop. 40 in 1880. Ruibnaia.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 57, 1881. Rybnaia.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 12, 1884.

Rice Lake. A settlement of the Missauga in the county of Northumberland, Ontario, usually called "Rice Lake Indians" on account of their proximity to that body of water. In 1909 they numbered 93. In the first half of the 19th century they were noted for their skill in "medicine."

Indians of Rice Lake.—Chamberlain in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, i, 151, 1888. Rice Lake band.—Can. Ind. Aff. Rep. 1906, 17, 1907.

Rice Lake Band. A Chippewa band residing on Rice lake, Barron co., Wis. Their settlement, according to Warren, was made as early as the year 1700. They numbered 184 in 1909, under La Pointe agency.

Rice Lake.—Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 164, 1885. Rice Lake band.—Washington treaty (1863) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 215, 1873.

Richardville, John B. See Peshewah.

Richibucto. A Micmac village at the mouth of Richibucto r., in Kent co., N. B. Elagibucto.—Vetromile, Abnakis, 58, 1866. Richibouctou.—Bollan (1748) in *Mass. Hist. Soc. Richuchi (Ri-chu-chi', from the name of a small red aquatic animal called by the Mexicans sandifuela). A small rancheria of the Tarahumare, not far from Norogachic, S. W. Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Rickahake. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1612, probably in the present Norfolk co., Va. It was occupied by some renegades who had formed a plot against a ruling chief and fled to escape punishment. The account is given by Pory in Smith (1629), Va., II, 64, repr. 1819. Cf. Righkahauk.

Riddle, Toby. See Winema.

Riechesni (Russian: 'brook village'). A former Aleut village on Little bay, Akun, Krenitzin ids., Alaska; pop. 37 in 1830.

Raychevnoi.—Veniaminof cited by Elliott, Cond. Aff. Alaska, 235, 1875.

Righkahauk. A village in 1608, possibly of the Chickahominy tribe, on the w. bank of Chickahominy r., in New Kent co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819. Cf. Rickahake.

Rincon (Span: 'corner,' in the S. W. usually referring to a corner, angle, or recess in a valley). A Luiseño village w. of San Luis Rey, San Diego co., Cal., in 1883; not to be confounded with Rincon in Riverside co. The name is now given to a tract of 2,552.81 acres of patented and allotted land, with 119 inhabitants, under the Pala agency. See Ind. Aff. Rep. for 1902, 175; for 1903, 147, 1904; Jackson and Kinney, Rep. Mission Ind., 29, 1883; Kelsey, Spec. Rep. Cal. Inds., 33, 1906.

Ring stones. See Perforated stones.

Rique ('place of panthers.'—Hewitt). An important palisaded town of the ancient Erie, situated probably near the present site of Erie, Erie co., Pa. In 1658 it was said to have been sacked by 1,200 Iroquois, although defended by between 2,000 and 3,000 combatants.

Rirak. A Yuit Eskimo village in Plover bay, N. E. Siberia; pop. 24 in 4 houses about 1895; 9 in 2 houses in 1901. The people are of the Aiwan division and are very poor.

I'en.—Bogoras, Chukchee, 29, 1904 (Chukchi designation.) Rirak.—Ibid. (Eskimo name). Tirik.—Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1899.

Rising Moose. See Tamaha.

Ritanoe. A village, probably of the Powhatan confederacy, in Virginia or North Carolina about 1612, near some copper mines.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Va., 26, 1849.

Ritenbenk. A missionary station and Danish trading post in N. Greenland, just across the bight from Disko id.

Ritenbenk.—Meddelelser om Grönland, xxv, map, 1902. Rittenbenk.—Crantz, Hist. Greenland, I, pl. I, 15, 1767.

Rito (Span.: 'rite,' 'ceremony'). A former pueblo of the Laguna Indians on the s. bank of San José r., Valencia co., N. Mex. It was deserted prior to 1848, because those who lived higher up on the Arroyo de Rito cut off all the water of the stream in seasons when they wanted to irrigate their lands, thus depriving the people of Rito of it (Abert in Emory Recon., 474, 1848). It is now a small Mexican village, but there are a few old Laguna houses there.

Ritual. See Ceremony, Religion.

River Desert. A band of Algonkin occupying the Maniwaki res., comprising about 44,537 acres, on Desert r., at its confluence with Gatineau r., Quebec. The members of this band, numbering 409 in 1909, gain their livelihood by "shantying," driving, hunting, and lumbering, and engage to a limited extent in agriculture. The women make moccasins, mittens, baskets, etc., while the men manufacture snowshoes and ax-handles. The older men drink to excess and are rather dependent on the whites for employment.

River Indians. Used by Hubbard in 1680 (Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., v, 33, 1815) as a collective term for the Indians formerly living on Connecticut r. above the coast tribes.

River Rouge. An Algonkin settlement in Ottawa co., Quebec, containing 31 Indians in 1884.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1884, 184, 1885.

River that Flies. A former band of the Miniconjou Sioux.—Culbertson in Smithsonian. Rep. 1850, 142, 1851.

Roanoak (Roanok, 'northern people'). The first people with whom Amadas and Barlowe came into contact after landing, in July, 1584, on the island of Wococon (udkakan 'curve' or 'bend,' from its shape as shown on White's map), in what is now North Carolina. The language of the inhabitants being unintelligible, it was but natural for them to mistake the word Wingandacoo for the name of the country, and the name Roanoak for that of the island which these Indians inhabited. On visiting this island (about 12 m. long) a few days after their arrival, Barlowe and his companions found at its northern end (a location whence possibly the name of the people) "a village of nine houses built of Cedar, and fortified round about with sharpe trees to keepe out their enemies, and the entrance into it made like a turne pike very artificially." This was the residence of Wingina, the werowance of the Roanoak, and of Granganameo, his brother. White marks this village "Roanoac," in accordance with the custom of the early settlers, but not of the natives, of designating Indian villages by the names of their inhabitants.

The name Roanoak, having been made known in England by Barlowe, in his report to Sir Walter Raleigh, became fixed, in the form Roanoke, in geographical nomenclature as the name, primarily, of an island; later it was applied to a river of Virginia and North Carolina, a city and county of Virginia, and villages in other states.

According to Mooney, the application of the name Roanoak (roanoke, ronoke, ronoak, the Virginia and North Carolina term from some Algonquian dialect, which the records of Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina constantly use to designate wampum (q. v.) and for which Lawson employs the form raurenoc) should be restricted to the village described above, one of those of the Secotan tribe, in 1585-89, under jurisdiction of Wingina. (W. R. G.)

Roanoke. A name applied, with several variants, by the Virginia colonists, to the shell beads employed by the neighboring Indians as articles of personal adornment or media of exchange; a case of substitution of a familiar word for one that was ill understood and probably more difficult to pronounce. Capt. John Smith (1612 and 1624) gives the Powhatan name for shell beads in the form of rawrenock and rauranoke, and William Strachey defines rarenaw as 'a chain of beads.' The root rār means to 'rub,' 'abrade,' 'smooth,' 'polish.' The original word may have been rdrenawok, 'smoothed shells,' pl. of rarenaw. See Shellwork, Wampum. (W. R. G.)

Robbiboe. A sort of pemmican soup stated by Schele de Vere (Americanisms, 44, 1872) to be in use throughout the N. W. among hunters, trappers, and others. This is the Canadian French rababou, a soup of flour and pemmican used by the voyageurs and early settlers. The word is probably derived from nabob, or napop, which signifies 'broth' in the Chippewa and closely related dialects of Algonquian, with n converted into r as in some languages of this stock. (A. F. C.)

Robesco. A rancheria of the Eudeve and the seat of a mission dating from 1673. Situated in central Sonora, Mexico, about lat. 29°, lon. 110°. Pop. 330 in 1678, and but 8 in 1730.

Robesco.—Rivera (1730) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 513, 1884. San Francisco de Javier Roboyeo.—Zapata (1678) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., III, 355, 1857. S. Fran. Javier Reboico.—Zapata (1678) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 246, 1884.

Robinson, Alexander. A chief of the Potawatomi, known also as Cheecheebingway; born at Mackinaw, Mich., in 1789. His father was a Scotch trader, his mother an Ottawa. Although but 5 years of age when Gen. Anthony Wayne fought the battle of the Miami in 1794, of which he was an accidental observer, Robinson retained a vivid recollection of what he saw on that occasion. He was present at the surrender of the fort at Chicago during the War of 1812, and tried in vain to prevent the massacre of the troops, succeeding in carrying off Capt. Helm, the commandant, and his wife, in a canoe, traversing the entire length of L. Michigan and placing them in safety at Mackinaw (Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., VII, 328, 1876). It is stated that, probably in 1827, he prevented the young men of his tribe from making an attack on Ft. Dearborn. In the Black Hawk war of 1832 Robinson and his people espoused the cause of the whites, and, so far as they actively participated, formed part of the force under Gen. Atkinson and Gen. Henry. He served as interpreter for Gen. Lewis Cass during his treaty negotiations with the Chippewa, June 6, 1820, and his name, in the form Cheecheepinquay, is signed to the treaty of Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 29, 1829; also, as Tshee-tshee-beeng-uay, to the supplementary treaty of Oct. 1, 1834. The sum of $5,000 was allowed him, and $400 granted his children. (C. T.)

Rocameca (contraction of Old Abnaki Nārākūmīguk, 'at (or on) the land upstream.'—Gerard). A former tribe of the Abnaki confederacy on Androscoggin r., on the border of Oxford and Franklin cos., Me. Their plantation extended for several miles along both banks of the stream. It is possible that they belonged to the Arosaguntacook. (J. M.)

Rocheachic ('fish place'). A small pueblo of the Tarahumare in Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Roche de Bœuf (French: 'buffalo rock'). An Ottawa village on the n. w. bank of Maumee r., near Waterville, Lucas co., Ohio. In 1831 the reservation was sold and the Indians removed to Kansas, where they joined the Ottawa of Blanchard Fork, and by treaty agreement were to become citizens in 1867.

Fondagame.—Detroit treaty (1807) in Am. St. Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 747, 1832 (misprint for Tondaganie, the chief). Roche de Bœuf.—Detroit treaty (1807) in U. S. Ind. Rockahominy. An Indian food preparation (the "cold flour" of Western hunters), used under different names (psitamun, muk'hik, yok'hig, rok'hig, pinole, tiste, etc.) from Canada to Peru, and made of parched corn (called by the Powhatan Indians of Virginia üpārumēndn, 'parched grain') pounded into a very fine powder. At the N. maple sugar is sometimes mixed with it, and, in Texas, powdered mesquite beans, while still farther s. chocolate and cane sugar enter into its composition. This preparation is carried in a skin bag or pouch by the hunter, who is able to subsist on it alone for several days at a time. It was formerly the principal food of Indian war parties going on distant expeditions, its bulk being reduced to the smallest possible compass, and it being so light that the Indians could, without inconvenience, carry a supply sufficient for a long journey. Under the name of mashika, it forms an important part of the rations furnished to the soldiers of the Peruvian army. From Powhatan of Virginia (with a vocalic suffix due to English-speaking people) rokahamēn, a verb meaning, in its indefinite sense, 'softened'; cognate with Lenape lok'hamēn, and Abnaki nuk'-hamen. (W. R. G.)

Rockaway (Renape: regawihāki, 'sandy land.'—Gerard.) A tribe formerly living about Rockaway and Hempstead, on the s. coast of Long id., N. Y. They were scattered over the plains and extended N. W. to Newton. Their principal village was Rechquaakie, besides which they had another on Hog id., in Rockaway bay.

Rockaway. A two-seated pleasure carriage with a canopy top, named after Rockaway, a river and a village in New Jersey, derived from the Delaware dialect of Algonquian prevalent in this region. (A. F. C.)

Rock Village. A former Potawatomi village in N. E. Illinois, on a reservation sold in 1837.—Tippecanoe treaty (1832) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 698, 1873; Washington treaty (1837), ibid., 715.

Rocky Point. A former Micmac village on Prince Edward id., Canada.

Rocono. See Roonoke.

Rokeyag. An Indian food preparation made of finely powdered parched corn: spelled also roucheag and rokee. The word is from Quiripi (Quinnipiac) rok'hig, abbreviated from rok'higan, and, like its Massachusetts and Pequot-Mohegan cognates, nokēhik and yokeag, means '(what is) softened.' (W. R. G.)

Rokohamin. See Rockahominy.

Roektsu.—Kroeber, MS., Univ. Cal. (Yurok name). Roque-choh.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 139, 1853.

Rolfe, Thomas. The son and only child of the celebrated Pocahontas (q. v.) of Virginia, by her husband John Rolfe. He was born in England in 1617, shortly before the death of his mother, and was educated in London by his uncle, Henry Rolfe. On reaching manhood he came to America, where, in 1641, he petitioned the Virginia government for permission to visit his mother's sister and uncle among their people, then at war with the English. He is styled by one writer "a gentleman of great distinction and possessed of ample fortune," but his name is not conspicuous in the records of his time. He left one daughter, who in turn left one son, through whom certain families trace descent from Pocahontas. (J. M.)

Romaine (Orāmānshipu, 'vermillion river,' from Montagnais orāmān 'vermillion', shipu 'river.'—Gerard). A Montagnais village and trading station on the coast of Labrador, at the mouth of Romaine r. In 1884 the inhabitants numbered 287.

Roman Nose (Wogīnl, 'hook nose'). A former noted chief of the Himoiyoqis warriorsociety of the Southern Cheyenne. The name "Roman Nose" was given him by the whites; his proper name was Sauts, 'Bat.' He was prominent in the Indian wars along the Kansas frontier between 1864 and 1868, and led the attack at the celebrated battle of Aricaree Fork or Beecher's Island, E. Colorado, Sept. 17-25, 1868, in which a company of 52 scouts under command of Col. (Gen.) G. A. Forsyth successfully held off several hundred Cheyenne warriors for 8 days until help arrived. Roman Nose was shot in the afternoon of the first day's fight and died that night in the Indian camp, to which he had been removed by his friends. See (Cheyenne). (J. M.)

Romonan. A division of the Costanoan family of California, presumably on San Francisco peninsula and connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco. Sometimes included under the term Costanos.

Romanons.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 31, 1861.

Ro-mo-nans.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, II, 506, 1852.

Rowanans.—Hittell, Hist. Cal., I, 731, 1898.

Ronatewisichroone. The Iroquois name of a tribe, probably Algonquian, formerly living about the upper Great Lakes. They sent a friendly message to the Seneca in 1715.—Livingston (1715) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 445, 1855.

Ronowadainie. One of the 6 "castles" of the Amikwa, near Michilimackinac, Mich., in 1723.—Albany Conf. (1723) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 693, 1855.

Root Diggers. A band, probably Shoshoni, but given by Culbertson (Smithson Rep. 1850, 144, 1851) as a Crow clan. See Digger.

Roots. For economic as well as for religious purposes the Indians used the various parts of plants to a greater extent than substances of animal or mineral character. This was the case even in the arid region, although plants with edible roots are limited mainly to areas having abundant rainfall. The more important uses of roots were for food, for medicine, and for dyes, but there were many other uses, as for basketry, cordage, fire-sticks, cement, etc., and for chewing, making salt, and flavoring.

Plants of the lily family furnished the most abundant and useful root food of the Indians throughout the U. S. The Eskimo of Kowak r. ate roots of the wild parsnip, which they secured from the caches in the nests of field-mice. The Indians of C. Flattery ate camas bulbs, procured by trade from tribes to their southward, as well as equisetum roots, and roots of fern, grass, water plants, clover, cinquefoil, and eelgrass. Equisetum tubers and eelgrass roots were eaten raw; other roots were boiled by means of hot stones or baked in pitovens. Camas (q. v.) was a staple root-food from the Wasatch mts. in Utah, northward and westward; it was an article of widespread commerce, influenced the migration of tribes, and might have become in time the basis of primitive agriculture, especially in the valley of Columbia r. Leiberg says: "Every meadow was a camas field. The plant was so plentiful in many places that it is no exaggeration to say that in the upper St Mary basin more than half of the total herbaceous vegetation in the lowlands was composed of this one species." The Skitswish people congregated here in the summer to dig camas and to hunt deer. The root was dug with a sharp-pointed stick. In part of this area the kouse root (q. v.), second only to camas in importance, was dug in April or May, before camas was in season. This root is the racine blanc of the Canadian voyageurs. It was pounded and made into thin cakes, a foot wide and 3 ft long, which were ribbed from the impression of the poles on which they were laid over the fire to smoke-dry or bake.

The tubers of the arrowhead plant (Sagittaria arifolia and S. latifolia), wappatoo (q. v.) in Algonquian, were widely used in the N. W. for food. When passing across Chewaucan marsh of the Oregon plains, E. of the Klamath res., Frémont noticed large patches of ground that had been torn up by Indian women in digging the roots of the wappatoo. The Chippewa and Atlantic Coast Indians also made use of them. The roots of the cattail flag and bur reed were eaten by the Klamath of Oregon, who used also the roots of carum, calochortus, and valerian. The Nez Percés of Idaho ate the balsam root (Balsamorhiza incana and B. sagittata), as well as the roots of Carum gairdneri, Callirhoe pedata, and Ptilocalais sp.

The pomme blanche, Indian turnip, or prairie potato (Psoralea esculenta) was prized by tribes living on high plains from the Saskatchewan to Louisiana and Texas. The root was dug by women by means of a pointed stick, then dried, pounded to meal, and cooked with jerked meat and corn. For winter use these roots were cut in thin slices and dried. The Sioux varied their diet with roots of the Indian turnip, two kinds of water lily, the water grass, and the mdo of the Sioux, called by the French pomme de terre, the ground-nut (Apios apios). To these may be added the tuber of milkweed (Asclepias tuberosa), valued by the Sioux of the upper Platte, and the root of the Jerusalem artichoke (Helianthus tuberosa), eaten by the Dakota of St Croix r. Other Plains tribes gathered esculent roots to eke out their food supply; among them the immense roots of the wild potato (Ipomœa leptophylla) were dug with great labor and eaten by the Cheyenne, Arapaho, and Kiowa. The Miami, Shawnee, and other tribes of the middle W. ate the "man of the earth" (Ipomœa pandurata) and Jerusalem artichoke (Helianthus tuberosus). From the universal habit among Californian tribes, especially the Paiute, of gathering food roots, the name "Diggers" was applied to them by the early settlers and has remained to this day in popular usage. The esculent roots growing in great variety in California were a considerable addition to the Indian larder. Among the plants thus utilized were the brake, tule, calochortus, camas, and various lilies. Calochortus bulbs, called wild sago, were eaten also by the tribes of Utah and Arizona. The bulbs are starchy and palatable, and it is said that the Mormons, during their first five years in Utah, consumed this root extensively.

In the S. W. few edible roots are found, though many medicinal roots are gathered. The Hopi, Zuñi, and other tribes eat the tubers of the wild potato (Solanum jamesii). The Southern and Eastern tribes also made use of the potato. Though this acrid tuber is unpalatable and requires much preparation to render it suitable for food, many tribes recognized its value. The Navaho, especially, dig and consumed large quantities of it, and on account of the griping caused by eating it, they ate clay with it as a palliative. The Pima, Hopi, and other Arizona tribes habitually chewed the roots of certain plants having sweet or mucilaginous properties.

The Seminole of Florida possessed a valuable plant called coonti (q. v.), the bulbous starchy root of which was converted into flour. The apparatus employed in the coonti industry comprised mortars and pestles, platforms, mash vessels, strainers, and vats. The starch, separated from the mashed root by washing and sedimentation, was fermented slightly, dried on palmetto leaves, and made into bread. A demand among the whites for coonti flour has led to the establishment of several mills in Florida. The coonti industry is similar to the cassava industry of the West Indies and South America, and it seems probable that the method of manufacture in Florida did not originate there. Hariot mentions 6 plants the roots of which were valued as food by the Virginia Indians, giving the native names, appearance, occurrence, and method of preparation. Many of the medicinal roots of eastern and southern U. S. were adopted by the whites from the Indian pharmacopeia; some of these are still known by their native names, and about 40 are quoted in current price lists of crude drugs. Indians formerly gathered medicinal roots to supply the trade that arose after the coming of the whites. Many roots were exported, especially ginseng, in which there was an extensive commerce with China; and, curiously enough, the Iroquois name for the plant has the same meaning as the Chinese name. Ginseng was discovered in America by Lafitau in 1716, and under the French régime in Canada many thousands of dollars' worth were sent yearly to the Orient. In Alaska ginseng was used by sorcerers to give them power. Although the use of edible roots by the Indians was general, they nowhere practised root cultivation, even in its incipient stages. In the U. S. the higher agriculture, represented by maize cultivation, seems to have been directly adopted by tribes which had not advanced to the stage of root cultivation. Ross, John. Chief of the Cherokee; born in Rossville, Ga., Oct. 3, 1790; died in Washington, D. C., Aug. 1, 1866. He was the son of an immigrant from Scotland by a Cherokee wife who was herself three-quarters white. His boyhood name of Tsan-usdi, 'Little John,' was exchanged when he reached man's estate for that of Gwisguwi, or Cooweescoowee, by which was known a large white bird of uncommon occurrence, perhaps the egret or the swan. He went to school in Kingston, Tenn. In 1809 he was sent on a mission to the Cherokee in Arkansas by the Indian agent, and thenceforward till the close of his life he remained in the public service of his nation. At the battle of the Horseshoe, and in other operations of the Cherokee contingent against the Creeks in 1813-14, he was adjutant of the Cherokee regiment. He was chosen a member of the national committee of the Cherokee Council in 1817, and drafted the reply to the U. S. commissioners who were sent to negotiate the exchange of the Cherokee lands for others w. of the Mississippi. In the contest against the removal his talents found play and recognition. As president of the national committee from 1819 till 1826 he was instrumental in the introduction of school and mechanical training, and led in the development of the civilized autonomous government embodied in the republican constitution adopted in 1827. He was associate chief with William Hicks in that year, and president of the Cherokee constitutional convention. From 1828 till the removal to Indian Ter. in 1839 he was principal chief of the Cherokee Nation, and headed the various national delegations that visited Washington to defend the right of the Cherokee to their national territory. After the arrival in Indian Ter., he was chosen chief of the united Cherokee Nation, and held that office until his death, although during the dissensions caused by the Civil War the Federal authorities temporarily deposed him. See Mooney, Myths of the Cherokee, 19th Rep. B. A. E., 122, 150, 224, 225, 1900.

Rouconk. A Neusiok village in 1701, probably on lower Neuse r., in Craven co., N. C.—Lawson (1709), Hist. Car., 384, 1860.

Roundhead (Stiahta). A Wyandot (Huron) chief who espoused the British cause in the War of 1812, being connected chiefly with Col. Proctor's command. Nothing is known of his early history, and though spoken of as a fine-looking man and a celebrated Indian chief, his history as recorded refers only to the time of the war mentioned. He was with Maj. Muir, of Proctor's command, on the Miami near Ft Miami, Ohio, Sept. 27-28, 1812, and urged in vain the English commander to hold his position and fight the American forces. In Oct. following he accompanied Maj. Muir to River Raisin, where Proctor was gathering his forces, and later in the same year he met his death. Gen. Proctor, in a letter dated Oct. 23, 1813, states that "the Indian cause and ours experienced a serious loss in the death of Round Head." A village in the s. w. corner of Hardin co., Ohio, his early home, bore his name, which survives in that of the present town of Roundhead built on its site. Roundhead had a brother known as John Battise, a man "of great size and personal strength," who was killed at Ft Meigs while fighting for the British. (C. T.)

Roymount. A Delaware village with 14 warriors, existing about 1648, near C. May, N. J.—Evelin (ca. 1648) quoted by Proud, Penn., 1, 114, 1797.

Rsanuk (Rsd'núk, 'beginning'). A Pima village about 1 m. e. of Sacaton station, on the Maricopa and Phoenix R. R., s. Arizona.—Russell in 26th Rep. B. A. E. 23, 1908.

Rsatuk (Rsd'túk, 'water standing'). A Pima village n. w. of Casa Blanca, s. Arizona.—Russell in 26th Rep. B. A. E., 23, 1908.

Rumsen. A division of the Costanoan family, formerly about Monterey, Cal., inhabiting Monterey, Sur, and Carmel r. The term has been made to include also, as a subdivision, the so-called Kalendaruk of the lower Salinas and Pajaro rs. As early as 1602 Vizcayno wintered among the Rumsen at Monterey, though he does not mention them by name. The first mission founded in California, after that of San Diego, was established as Carmelo in Rumsen territory in 1770. Six or eight Rumsen, mostly old women, survived about Monterey and Carmel in 1903. The following villages of the Rumsen are mentioned: Achasta, Echilat, Guayusta, Kakonkaruk, Karmentaruka, Sargentaruka, Tukutnut, Wachanaruka. (A. L. K.)

Rum's Village. A former village of the Potawatomi, about 4 m. s. of South Bend, St Joseph co., Ind. It was included in the lands ceded to the U. S. by treaty of Chicago, Aug. 29, 1821.

Running Water. A former Cherokee town on the s. e. bank of Tennessee r., below Chattanooga, near the n. w. Georgia line, and 4 m. above Nickajack. It was settled in 1782 by Cherokee who espoused the British cause in the Revolutionary war, and was known as one of the Chickamauga towns. It was destroyed in the fall of 1794. See Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1887; Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 54, 78, 1900.

Runonvea. An Iroquois village formerly situated near Big Flats, Chemung co., N. Y., and burned Aug. 31, 1779, by the troops under Gen. Sullivan.—Cook, Jour. Sullivan's Exped., 381, 1887.

Runtee. A circular piece of flat shell drilled edgeways and probably strung and originally used as an ornament. The name runtee was first mentioned, a century after the settlement of Virginia, by Beverley, who says of the objects so called: "Runtees are made of the Conch-Shell as the Peak is, only the Shape is flat and round like a Cheese, and drill'd Edge-ways" (Hist. Va., bk. III, 145, 1705). Holmes says of these objects (2d Rep. B. A. E., 230, 1883): "The fact that they are found in widely separated localities indicates that they were probably used in trade since the advent of the whites." The word runtee is not Algonquian, but evidently an English corruption of French arrondi, 'rounded,' 'made round,' short, perhaps, for écaille arrondie, 'shell made round.' Mr Holmes further remarks that "this is probably some form of bead held in high esteem by tribes of the Atlantic coast when first encountered by the whites, who have taken up its manufacture for purposes of trade." Råle mentions shell ronds (paganrank) worn at the neck by Abnaki men, one of which was worth one beaver, and ronds (paghiganak) of the women, six small ones or three large ones of which were worth one beaver. See Beads, Shell-work. (W. R. G.)

Ruptari. One of the two villages of the Mandan (q. v.) on the upper Missouri in North Dakota in 1804. When the Mandan were almost destroyed by the ravages of smallpox in 1837, the remnant abandoned their villages to the Arikara and established a new settlement nearer Knife river. They subsequently removed to Ft Berthold.

Russian influence. Russian influence on the natives of N. W. America began with the voyage of Bering (1741), which revealed the wealth of peltries to the traders of E. Siberia. The Siberian region had been mostly subjected by the traders at the end of the 17th century, but the processes of intertribal trade had carried the wrought iron of the Yakut, the pipes and tobacco of Mongolia, among these people much earlier than the advent of Russians, who were the first to introduce firearms. But the intense hostility between the Siberian and American Eskimo at Bering strait restricted the trade and the intercontinental influences for many years later.

The traders conquered the Aleut, but were checked by the more warlike Kodiak Eskimo and by internal dissensions; only with the formation of a general trading association (1781) and its sequel, a government monopoly (1790 and 1799), were exploration and trade systematically organized. S. and E. of Cook inlet the Russians had to meet the opposition of the Spaniards, the English, and the free American traders as well as the well-armed and warlike Tlingit tribes, Haida, etc. In the eastern interior the Hudson's Bay Company began to draw away trade as early as 1810. Owing to the hostile attitude of the Spanish authorities and the need of food supplies, the Russians bought, in 1811, a small tract of land from the natives at Bodega bay, Cal., and later one at Russian r., where they raised cereals for the support of the more northerly colonies and did a little trading. In this way they came in contact with the natives of California. As they found the Tlingit would not trade with them, they brought Aleut sea-otter hunters from the N., with their kaiaks, to hunt on the otter grounds of the Alexander archipelago, the California coast, and on at least one occasion came with one of these parties as far s. as the Santa Barbara ids., the visit lingering in the mind of the last surviving Santa Rosa islander late in the eighties. With the progress of exploration direct trade and contact with the natives on the N. W. coast proceeded about as follows:

Desultory mission work (Aleut and at Kodiak), 1793–1816.

Systematic mission work (Lower Yukon), about 1860.

Distribution.—Aleut were transported

e. and s. and in later years as servants at the trading posts. Each trading post of importance had a Yakut fisherman in charge of salmon traps. Californian natives were taken to Kodiak in 1841, where there was a small village of superannuated Company's servants as late as 1870—now, probably, all dead. Some Kanaka from Oahu took part (ca. 1850) in the Company's whaling expeditions, which had no great success.

Changes of sustenance, and stimulants.—The art of distilling was introduced among the Tlingit by Russian convicts about 1796, and, though forbidden under severe penalties by the Company, was secretly practised at many of the isolated trading posts. The use of cereals as food was hardly known until the sixties, except among the Company's servants at posts. The same may be said of sugar and tea. They were known as gifts or luxuries, not as trading goods. The natives until 1867 lived entirely off the natural food resources of the country, as did most of the Russians and Hudson's Bay Company's men.

Clothing.—Cotton drill, cloth, and blankets took the place of the more valuable furs early in the history of the trade, but till recently skins and native footwear held their own as vastly better for winter wear.

Tools, utensils, and guns.—The first iron tools were made in imitation of the stone and native copper tools and weapons (iron celts were called "toes"); exotic forms came very slowly into use. The native, as late as 1866, preferred to buy malleable iron or wood-files, and to make his own tools in ancient shapes. Kettles and frying-pans were first adopted of exotic utensils. Guns came first from the Hudson's Bay Company and free traders; percussion guns came only in the sixties. Flint-and-steel was eagerly accepted from the very first, matches only about 1867. Axes, sheath knives, and saws were always sought in trade; other tools made their way much more slowly.

Ornaments.—These, except pearl buttons (among the Tlingit) and Chinese cash, were hardly salable among the practical Alaskan natives. There was practically no sale for such things except dentalium shell, small mirrors, and copper or brass wire for rings or bangles, which the natives made themselves. Bright-colored blankets and striped drilling were a good deal used, and certain kinds of beads, which were used as a sort of currency quite as much as for ornament.

Tobacco.—This probably reached the Bering strait region (with pipes) by intertribal commerce from Mongolia before the Russians brought it. The American type of pipe was not found there until much later, and was rarely seen until after 1867. The Mongolian type of pipe is not known s. and e. of Bristol bay, where the Russians first introduced tobacco, but was universal n. and w. of that locality. Tobacco is not mentioned in early lists of trading goods, and was probably only in general use after the Russians had made permanent settlements or trading posts.

Language.—The Chinook jargon was introduced, almost as soon as it was formed, by free traders in s. e. Alaska, and was also more or less used in this region by the Russian traders. In the Eskimo region a jargon arose, composed of Russian, Eskimo, and Hawaiian words, corrupted, and used without inflection. This jargon has been in use from Bristol bay to Pt Barrow and on the Eskimo coast of Siberia, and has been frequently mistaken by hasty travelers and recorded in vocabularies as an Eskimo dialect. The Vega vocabularies were partly of this kind. The Aleut used Russian, and so far as is known never had a jargon.

Myths and religion.—The Aleut were converted to the Greek Church, of which they are, so far as they understand it, devoted members, though retaining secretly much of their ancient religion. On the rest of the people of Alaska the influence of the Greek Church was infinitesimal, and consisted in a purely nominal adherence by rare individuals to a few formalities. From what is known of the myths and mythology of either Tlingit or Eskimo, there was in them, up to 1868, no trace of Christian teaching. With the first introduction of Russian priests in 1793, it is probable that native children were taught to repeat the responses and catechism and join in the intoned service. The teaching of reading, writing, and other secular branches did not come in most cases till much later, but the dates are not recorded.

Population.—Zymotic diseases, normally unknown in the region, at various times have been introduced by traders and have proved very fatal in approximately the order following: scarlet fever, measles, smallpox, syphilis. The last-named was introduced into the Norton Sound region by the American Telegraph Expedition in 1866, the Russians having been successful in excluding it up to that time. A disease affecting the bones is noticeable in many prehistoric skeletons, but seems not to have been syphilitic. After the warfare with the early traders ceased, the natives under Russian auspices, when friendly, were carefully protected as purveyors of peltries, and probably did not seriously diminish in numbers under the conditions then existing.

In general the Russians endeavored to maintain the status quo among the natives

(other than Aleut and Tlingit), and succeeded fairly well in so doing. The Russian law attaching the individual to the soil (zemlia) of his commune operated to prevent legal marriages between native Americans, whose "zemlia" was American, and Russian servants of the company whose "zemlia" was Russian; since when the latter finished his term of service (if not in debt to the company) he was obliged to go back to his original domicile, while he could not take his native wife away from her legal domicile or "zemlia." In this way numerous unions not legally sanctioned grew up, and the women who entered into them were apparently regarded socially as in no way less respectable than the occasional Russian wives with whom they associated on apparently equal terms, and they made as devoted partners and mothers. At the transfer of Alaska to the United States, many of these unions were legalized by authority of the Czar in compliance with the terms of the treaty, which permitted Russian residents to remain and become American citizens if they saw fit. The children of these unions with Tlingit, Eskimo, Aleut, or Californian natives formed a large and intelligent class on the N. W. coast, known to the Russians as "creoles," a class which gave many officials and at least one governor (Etolin) to Russian America. The Russo-Tlingit and Russo-Eskimo crosses were the most numerous and fertile. The issue of casual and mercenary unions was a small factor, as the women in the case were usually infertile. The purity of the Aleut blood probably suffered most from this cause, as that of a subject people; while the quasi-legitimate unions above referred to frequently produced large families which later formed an important element of the civilized population. Sabeata. A Jumano (Tawehash) chief from the mouth of the Rio Conchos in Chihuahua, born in New Mexico. In Oct. 1683, he went to Paso del Norte, Texas, and asked Gov. Cruzate for missions for his people and their friends, and for protection against the Apache. His native name was Sabeata, but he had been baptized Juan, at Parral. It was his story of the "great kingdom of the Texas" that led to Domingo de Mendoza's expedition to the interior of Texas in 1683-84. Sabeata accompanied the expedition, but before it returned he gained the ill-will of the Spaniards and absconded. Meanwhile missions were established for his people at the mouth of the Conchos (Mendoza, Viage, 1683-84, MS. in Archivo Gen.). In 1691 Sabeata was met on the Rio Guadalupe at the head of a band of his people on their annual buffalo hunt. He still carried his Spanish commission as "governor," and he asked Massanet for more missionaries (Massanet, Diario que hicieron los padres misioneros, Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 98-103, MS.). His name appears also as Iabiata, Safiata, and Saveata. (H. E. B.)

Sabino. An Abnaki village in 1608 at the mouth of Kennebec r., Me., probably on the w. side of the main channel.

Saboba. A Luiseno village, said to have been the principal one of San Jacinto res., Cal. Though Luiseno, the dialect differs somewhat from that at San Luis Rey. San Jacinto res., established 6 m. from San Jacinto, consists of 2,960 acres of poor, almost waterless land. The original dwellings of the Saboba people were jacales, but these gave place in turn to adobe and frame houses. They gain a livelihood chiefly by laboring for white people, and by cultivating the 150 acres of irrigable land contained in their reservation. Saboba village contains a Catholic church, and a Government school that was the first to be established among the S. California Indians. The Saboba people formerly made baskets in considerable numbers. They are said to have a noticeable strain of Mexican blood. They are inclined to drunkenness, especially on the feast day held in celebration of Mexican independence, owing to the introduction of liquor by the whites. In 1909 the population was 140.

Sacagawea. A Shoshoni woman who accompanied Lewis and Clark. She was the wife of Toussaint Charbonneau, a French Canadian voyageur living among the Hidatsa, who was engaged by the explorers as interpreter, and she was desirous of returning to her own people, the Shoshoni of the Rocky mts., from whom she had been captured by the Hidatsa and sold to Charbonneau when about 14 years of age. On the Missouri r. her husband, by his bad seamanship, overturned the boat on which were the records of the expedition, but as they floated in the river they were seized by Sacagawea and thus preserved. The leaders of the expedition have recorded praises of the fortitude and serviceableness exhibited on many occasions by Birdwoman, as she was also called, the English rendering of her Hidatsa name (tsakaka, 'bird'; mia, otherwise wia, bia, 'woman'), though she was encumbered by an infant, born during the journey. When Lewis and Clark came to the first band of Shoshoni, of which her brother had become chief, Sacagawea acted as interpreter and enabled the expedition to obtain ponies, without which they could not have crossed the divide. Of her, Lewis wrote: "Sah-cah-gar-we-ah our Indian woman was one of the female prisoners taken at that time tho' I cannot discover that she shews any immotion of sorrow in recollecting this event, or of joy in being again restored to her native country; if she has enough to eat and a few trinkets to wear I believe she would be perfectly content anywhere." (Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, I, 283, 1904.) On the return journey she guided Capt. Clark's party, when they were lost, through the mountain passes of Montana. She remained among the Shoshoni in Wyoming, and when the Wind River res. was created took up her abode there with her son, and there she died, near Ft. Washakie, Apr. 9, 1884, almost a hundred years of age. Her grave is marked with a brass tablet, presented by Timothy F. Burke, of Cheyenne, Wyo. The last heard of her husband was in 1838, when Larpenteur saw him in the Hidatsa country. He was then an old man. A bronze statue of this heroine of the expedition was erected in City Park, Portland, Oreg., in the summer of 1905, and another statue is to be placed in the State capitol at Bismarck, N. Dak. Sacahayé. An unidentified village or tribe mentioned to Joutel in 1687 (Margry, Déc., III, 410, 1878), while he was staying with the Kadohadacho on Red r. of Louisiana, by the chief of that tribe, as one of his allies.

Sacaspada. A Calusa village on the s. w. coast of Florida, about 1570.—Fontaneda Memoir (ca. 1575), Smith trans., 19, 1854.

Sacaton (from Nahuatl sacaton, 'small grass', dim. of zacatl, Hispanized zacate, 'grass', 'hay'). A former small settlement and trading station of the Pima, on the Gila r., about 22 m. E. of Maricopa station and 16 m. N. of Casa Grande station on the S. P. R. R., s. Arizona. In 1858 it had 204 inhabitants, and in 1863, 144. On the opposite bank of the river is now the seat of the Pima agency, which controls the Pima, Maricopa, and Papago tribes, numbering about 6,500, and has a flourishing boarding school. See Uturituc.

Sachal. Given by Wilkes (U. S. Expl. Exped., v, 132, 133, 1844) as the name of a tribe, numbering 40, on a lake of the same name and on Chehalis r., s. w. Wash., into which the lake flows "through a river also called Sachal."

Sachem. (1) In the form of government of the Indians of Massachusetts, the supreme ruler of a territory inhabited by a certain number of tribes, each governed by an inferior sachem generally called by the colonists a sagamore (a cognate word of Abnaki origin), and acting under his command and protection. The dignity was hereditary, never elective. (2) By extension, a name given by writers to the chief of a tribe of other North American Indians. (3) One of a body of high officials in the Tammany Society of New York city.

The name sachim first occurs in Mourt's Relation (1622), and next in Winslow's Good Newes from New England (1624).

The plural form given by Roger Williams (1643) shows that the word is an abbreviation of sáchimau. The name is from the Narraganset dialect, one of the prominent phonetic peculiarities of which was the assibilation of gutturals. Sáchimau (= sátschimau) is by assibilation of original k from sákimau = Abnaki sang'man (whence, by corruption, sagamore) = Passamaquoddy sogmo = Lenape sakimau = Chippewa adgima, all radical words—words that cannot now be referred to any known root.

The word has given rise to the adjective sachemic, and the substantives sachemdom and sachemship (Gookin, 1674). A Long Island serpent, probably the milk-snake, has been called sachem-snake. See Chiefs, Government, Sagamore. (W. R. G.)

Sacheriton (Sa-cher-i-ton). A division of the Skoton, mentioned in the treaty of Nov. 18, 1854 (U. S. Ind. Treat., 23, 1873), as dwelling on Rogue r., Oreg.

Sáchim. See Sachem.

Saconnet. A band or small tribe living near Sakonnet pt., Newport co., R. I., connected with the Wampanoag or the Narraganset. Under the woman chief Ashawonks they took the side of the English in King Philip's war of 1675, and from her their land was purchased by the whites. In 1700 they numbered about 400; but in 1763 they were visited by an epidemic which considerably diminished their numbers, so that by 1803 they had dwindled to a dozen persons, living near Compton. Their chief village bore the name of the tribe. (J. M.)

Sacrifice. In spite of the present very general application of this term, its original connection with religion is shown by the meaning of the word itself, "to make sacred." Instead of the simple dedication of objects to a deity or deities, however, such as this would imply, it is associated in the minds of most people with the idea of self-abnegation, or the giving up of something valuable on the part of the sacrificer. Yet this is but one of several ideas pertaining to sacrifice in the minds of primitive people, and Tylor in his standard work on Primitive Culture has put the matter in a nutshell while summing up the evolution—or perhaps we should rather say devolution—of sacrifice when he states that "the ruder conception that the deity takes and values the offering for itself, gives place on the one hand to the idea of mere homage expressed by a gift, and on the other to the negative view that the virtue lies in the worshipper depriving himself of something prized." "These ideas," he adds, may be broadly distinguished as the gift-theory, the homage-theory, and the abnegation-theory." From what follows it will be seen that the gift-theory was the dominant one among Indian tribes, yet the ordeals of such a ceremony as the Sun-dance show plainly that the abnegation-theory occupied a prominent position in the thought of some tribes; nor can we deny that the homage-theory was also entertained, however difficult it may be to isolate it thoroughly from the others. In all this the differences in point of view between North American Indians and the lower classes of so-called civilized races on the subject of sacrifice is not very great. A far greater distinction is that between the view that sacrifice produces a change in the deity beneficial to the worshipper, and the view that sacrifice produces a beneficial change in the worshipper himself.

To understand each sacrifice properly, six questions need to be answered: (1) who sacrifices, (2) to what being or beings the sacrifice is offered, (3) the nature of the sacrifice, (4) the method of offering it, (5) the time when it was performed, and (6) its object.

In that part of North America n. of Mexico by far the greater number of sacrifices were offered by individuals, either male or female, as when bits of food were thrown into the fire during meals, or articles were laid upon sacred rocks or upon shrines. The offering of first-fruits among the Natchez was made by each father of a family, and on certain occasions when a live stag was sacrificed by the Iroquois it was the oldest man of the hut or village that gave the death-blow. At the moose feast of the Montagnais the sacrifice was made by him who had killed the animal. Among the Muskogean tribes a special sacrifice was offered by the war leader and his religious assistant before starting out upon an expedition, and in general it may be said that the leaders of war or hunting parties took the lead also in sacrifices and all other observances having in view the success of the enterprise. But just as the Muskogean war leader had a religious assistant to share his duties, so warriors on the N. Pacific coast were always accompanied by at least one shaman. In prescribing what offerings should be made in case of sickness, the shaman was an absolute guide, though the offerings were actually furnished by the family of the sick man and were often a mere payment to the shaman himself. Society and tribal rites and ceremonies were oftener than not themselves considered as sacrifices, and thus furnish us with examples of sacrifices participated in by large bodies of people. Not as frequently as in the Old World, and yet occasionally (witness, for instance, the White Dog ceremony of the Iroquois and the human sacrifice of the Skidi Pawnee), there is a special national sacrifice consummated by chosen individuals to whom the title of "priest" may very properly be applied.

A complete answer to the second question would necessitate a catalogue of all the superhuman beings conceived of by every Indian tribe, as well as those material beings and objects which were supposed to possess supernatural power in the slightest degree. Nevertheless it may be of interest to mention some of those of which there is direct information. The most prominent are: the sky, the earth, the sun, the moon, the four cardinal points, the winds, the thunder, the mountains, rocks of all sizes and shapes, particularly those of peculiar appearance or such as resemble things animate, certain animals and trees, springs, places where paint was obtained, eddies and rapids in rivers, and a number of monsters supposed to dwell beneath the surface of lakes, rivers, and the ocean. In the case of the natural objects mentioned, it is to be understood that it was not the object itself in any case which was thus approached, but the animating soul of each. In addition, offerings were made to personal manitos and medicine bundles by the possessors of the same, by shamans to their guardian spirits, and even by the laity to shamans, though in this last case the shaman was perhaps considered only as an intermediary. In several cases, even by christianized Indians, sacrifices were offered to missionaries, to the crosses which they carried or set up, and to the mission churches.

The article by far the most widely used in sacrifice was native tobacco. Next came articles of food, and then articles of clothing and adornment, particularly the latter. Hunting and fishing implements are mentioned less frequently, evidently because it would be more agreeable to the deity to receive food outright than the means for obtaining it. Dogs, particularly white ones, were sacrificed by the Iroquois, Cree, Ottawa, Illinois, and related tribes, and in at least one feast by the Arikara and the Skidi Pawnee. In the buffalo country its place seems to have been taken in a measure by the buffalo, the skin of a white animal being again preferred. In one early narrative a buffalo-skin is mentioned among sacrifices offered by the Illinois, while the skull of a buffalo was hung at the top of an Arapaho medicine-lodge erected by youths just previous to their first war expedition. The greatest importance, however, seems to have been attached to it by the Mandan, who preferred the skin of a young white cow buffalo, or, failing that, the skin of a white bull or an old cow. The offal of a buffalo was sacrificed by the Arikara. Offerings of bears, or rather the skins and skulls of these animals, are referred to among the Iroquois and Algonquian tribes of the N. E. forest country, being mentioned as far W. as the Illinois. A kind of bear sacrifice also existed along the N. Pacific coast and the neighboring mountain region. Deer, elk, and moose were sacrificed by the Iroquois and Algonquian tribes of the N. and E. Deer-hoofs were held in great esteem by the N. W. tribes, and were used to make fringes for the dancing skirt or apron of a shaman; it is natural, therefore, to find them mentioned in a list of articles sacrificed by the Cœur d'Alènes. In the same list wolf-tails also occur. On the N. Pacific coast we find cuts of whale, pieces of fresh or dried fish, and grease of all kinds. A Montagnais sacrifice consisted of eels, while the Mistassin sacrificed fish-bones. Among birds the first place is taken by the eagle, which appears to have been employed everywhere, the part offered being the down, wings, or tail. Feathers of other birds, especially those of a red color, like the flicker-feathers of the N. Pacific coast, are also mentioned. In this connection reference should be made to the feathered prayer-sticks (q. v.) of the Pueblos, Navaho, and Apache. It is possible that similar devices were employed elsewhere, since Maximilian mentions in a Mandan sacrifice "little sticks or rods to which some feathers were attached." Sticks without any such attachment the Iroquois were accustomed to throw upon a certain sacred stone whenever they passed. Among Iima offerings Russell mentions twigs of the creosote bush, and small stones. Next to tobacco, corn was the most highly prized vegetal product in most of North America, and we consequently find it used in sacrifices and ceremonies by most of the agricultural tribes. Adair states that the only sacrifice of corn among the Creeks was at their annual festival which corresponds to the harvest feast, or feast of ingathering, in the Old World (see Busk). In some form or other it is probable that this was represented among all the corn-raising tribes of the E. and S. As might have been expected, this form of sacrifice also assumes important proportions among the tribes of the S. W.—the Pueblos, Navaho, and Apache—a constant sacrifice among them being sacred meal, while among the Pawnee of the plains mush was used. Among other sacrifices of vegetal character should be mentioned the red cedar-bark which figures so prominently in the secret-society performances of the Indians on the N. Pacific coast. A large Iroquois sacrifice, made in response to a dream, contained, among other articles, four measures of sunflower seed and as many of beans. The incense root of the Hupa should also be noted in this connection. Manufactured articles were represented by blankets, arrows, powder and lead, shell beads and articles made of them, pans, kettles, elk-skin fishing-lines, cloth of various kinds, especially red cloth, rings, bracelets, pipes, knives, wooden and clay images, guns, and hatchets. The predilection for red, already remarked in connection with feathers and cloth, finds expression also in a very wide use of red paint for sacrificial purposes. Paint, like any other article, might be offered loose to a supernatural being, but usually it was daubed upon the stone, tree, or other object to which it was desired to show respect. In their own ceremonies Dakota women use blue paint oftener than red, but this is not a constant indication of sex.

Unless the customary immolation of a number of captives at the end of a war expedition may be considered sacrificial, human sacrifices do not seem to have been particularly common N. of Mexico, though there are a number of instances. Perhaps the best known is that of the sacrifice of a female captive to the morning star by the Skidi Pawnee. An early missionary tells of the sacrifice of a female captive by the Iroquois, and states that parts of her body were sent to the other villages of the tribe to be eaten. It appears from Cuq that the Nipissing formerly offered a young female captive upon an elevated platform as a sacrifice to "the god of war," but the wording leaves us somewhat in doubt whether the sacrifice was anything more than symbolic. In ancient times Kansa Indians put the hearts of slain foes into the fire as a sacrifice to the winds, but later, animals such as deer and grouse were substituted. The Hurons burned the viscera and a portion of the flesh of one who had been drowned or had died of a cold as a sacrifice to the Sky god, who was supposed to be angry. In 1700, when Iberville was among the Taensa villages, their temple was struck by a thunderbolt and burned, upon which five women threw their infants into the flames as a sacrifice to the offended deity, and more would have done the same had not the French interposed. On another occasion the Iroquois drove arrows into the body of a new-born babe, ground up its bones, and swallowed a little of the resultant powder before starting out to war; but this may have been a war-medicine rather than a true sacrifice. Since the highest class of nobles among the Natchez and Taensa were supposed to be of divine origin, the slaughter of a number of servants, and of other members of their families, to wait on them in the hereafter, was of the nature of a sacrifice, although of an unusual character. Another form of human sacrifice was the offering of scalps. Among the Arapaho these were hung up in the medicine lodge, and on one occasion De Smet passed a pole on the bank of the Missouri on which hung a scalp offered by the Arikara. He assumed that this was a sacrifice to the sun, but more likely it was to some river monster. At the time of the Sun-dance, pieces of flesh were cut from their bodies by the participants, offered to the sun, and then placed under a buffalo chip. In fact all the mutilations inflicted at the Sun-dance and related ceremonies, such as cutting off finger-joints and slitting the flesh for the attachment of thongs, partook of the character of sacrifices. It is said that the blood shed in tearing these thongs through the flesh was acceptable to Tiráwa, chief deity of the Pawnee. On one occasion each member of a war-party sacrificed a small piece of flesh cut from his tongue. Hair—presumably human hair—is mentioned among sacrifices offered by the Arikara and the Ntlakyapamuk, but more often it was cut or singed off out of respect for the dead. Before passing from this subject it should be noted that certain other sacrifices are believed to have been substituted for an earlier sacrifice of human beings, just as the Kansa substituted animals of various kinds for human hearts. Hewitt is of the opinion that the white dog of the Iroquois has been substituted in this way; while Fewkes regards the prayer-sticks of the S. W. as representing animals or human beings. There are many points in favor of such views, but it will not do to theorize too far on the basis of general resemblances. Finally, it is important to remark that the object of sacrifice being usually to please a supernatural being by acting in accordance with his supposed desires, it is obvious that songs, dances, feasts, and ceremonies generally may be employed for the same end and in such cases properly fall within the same category. They are viewed in this light by the Indians themselves.

The method of sacrificing depended on the nature of the sacrifice itself and the being who was supposed to receive it. Offerings were generally made to sacred stones by laying the articles on or near them, inserting them in crevices, or throwing them in their direction. As already noted, red paint was usually smeared upon objects considered sacred, and Ntlakyapamuk women always painted their faces red when they went to gather berries or to dig roots on certain mountains, or just before they came in sight of certain lakes. When mountains or rocks were close to some body of water, however, they might be considered, as among the Haida, the dwellings of subaqueous beings, and sacrifices were then thrown into the water in front of them. The Haida always placed on a paddle the articles to be sacrificed, repeated a prayer or request, and let them slide into the sea. Sacrifices to more distant beings or those not so distinctly localized were put into the fire. Sometimes, as in the case of the white dog of the Iroquois, the human victim of the Skidi, and a Muskhogean deer sacrifice mentioned by Adair, in which the animal was burned on a fire of green boughs, complete cremation took place. Usually, however, only part of the animal or article was consumed, the rest being eaten or otherwise employed or thrown away. At feasts or even ordinary repasts a little meat, fish, grease, etc., was often thrown into the fire, though sometimes merely on the ground. Among the Kiowa any drink-offering, such as water or coffee, was poured out on the ground as a sacrifice to the earth, but by the N. W. coast tribes the same thing was done for the benefit of the departed. An early missionary observes that the Hurons threw tobacco on the red-hot stones in their sweat-lodge when bathing. Still another method of offering sacrifices was to place them on trees or poles. Dogs were hung on trees or tall poles by the central Algonquians and some of the Plains tribes, and white buffalo-skins were treated in the same manner by the Mandan and by other tribes of the northern plains. These were offered to the sun, the lord of life, or to other principal or celestial deity, but offerings were made in the same manner to beings in lakes, rivers, and springs, except that in such cases the poles were placed at the edge of the water. One case of sickness is recorded in which three dogs were hung to the door of the house as an offering for recovery. Such sacrifices, as well as those placed upon rocks and other natural features, were allowed to remain until they rotted to pieces, though they were sometimes plundered by foreign tribes and quite uniformly by white people. In other cases valuable objects were simply presented or allowed to remain for a time and afterward removed. Vessels or utensils so offered may have been regarded as lent to the deity, but in the case of food the idea was usually present that supernatural beings partook only of the spirit of the food and man could very properly devour its substance. Fewkes states this to be the belief of the Hopi; and a missionary to one of the Eastern tribes remarks that during a certain feast they would ask their deity to take food, yet offered him nothing. A large number of feasts among American Indian tribes doubtless had this communion character. In other cases the deity might be fed by placing food in the mouth of a mask representing him. At most sacrificial feasts the food was devoured by all alike. Only occasionally do we find that function appropriated by shamans, priests, or some special class of persons as was so frequently the case in the Old World. The Natchez, however, present an example to the contrary, food being taken to the temple, offered to the gods there, and then sent to the houses of the chief and his principal men. Tobacco was sometimes offered loose, but oftener in a pipe, the stem of the pipe being presented to the deity, or whiffs of smoke directed toward him, a common custom being to offer it to the four cardinal points, zenith, and nadir, successively. Even without any accompanying actions it was often supposed that the spiritual part of tobacco, when smoked ceremonially, was wafted to the presence of the gods. Powdered tobacco was sometimes blown into the air or upon some sacred object, and eagle down was treated in the same manner. Not infrequently the sacrifice bore a symbolic resemblance to the object desired by the person sacrificing. Thus the Hupa offer dry incense root upon a rock, near which dwells a being supposed to have control of the weather, when they desire the rains to cease, but incense root mixed with water when they wish the frosts to melt and disappear. In the same way Alaskan Eskimo, when animals of a certain species are scarce, offer the skin of such an animal to the moon in order that the being who resides there may send them more.

Sacrifices to rocks, rapids, eddies, and other natural features were usually made every time a person passed them, and offerings at meals and feasts were of course governed by the time these occurred, the latter being often held as the result of a dream or a vow. The white dog feast of the Iroquois was celebrated five days after the first appearance of the new moon following the winter solstice. The harvest feast of the Southern tribes and the corn-planting sacrifice of the Quapaw were in the same way dependent on the succession of the seasons, as was the Ntlakyapamuk sacrifice of the first berries of the season. Sacrifices to the thunder-beings were naturally most common during thunderstorms, and periods of want, war, or disease determined others. The Pawnee and the Creeks sacrificed part or sometimes the whole of the first buffalo or deer killed during both their summer and winter hunts. The first buffalo killed by a young Pawnee boy was also offered, and a special offering was made in this tribe when the first thunder was heard in the spring and it was known that winter was over. The Skidi Pawnee made their human sacrifice "about corn-planting time," but it was not annual. According to Cushing there was annually among the Zuñi a grand sacrifice of prayer-sticks by the "Prey Brotherhood Priesthood of the medical societies," and at the full moon of each month lesser sacrifices of the same kind by the male members of the Prey clans.

The objects for which sacrifices were made were as numerous and varied as the desires of the suppliants. The sum and substance of all was, as usual, to escape evils and secure benefits. Naturally enough, considering the economic conditions among Indian tribes, food was asked for most frequently. Second only to this came freedom from illness. Other petitions were for good weather, the cessation of storms, a calm sea, rain, good crops of corn, increase of courage and success in war, hunting, or fishing, assistance in passing rapids or dangerous reefs, and the preservation of the home and the family. A full consideration of this question, however, comes rather under the head of Prayer (q. v.).

As on mythology and prayer, a discussion of sacrifice borders closely also on mortuary customs, the shades of the dead being invoked and presented with food, clothing, etc., much as in the case of higher powers. There are many cases in which supernatural beings are said to have been men originally, but a real worship of ancestors as such appears to be altogether absent in spite of the almost divine honors which were paid dead chiefs among the Natchez. In dealing with tobacco we touch on the subject of incense, which may be defined as a sacrifice to please the sense of smell of the deity just as food pleases his palate, and songs, dances, and ceremonies please his ears and eyes. On another side we approach the question of taboos, which are nothing more or less than prohibitions against doing certain things displeasing to the gods; and we find ourselves even concerned with confession, since among the Eskimo confession of the transgression of a taboo secures immunity from its harmful consequences. Consecration confronts us in the Natchez custom of presenting seed to the temple before planting, and atonement is suggested by the case of the Iroquois, who, having dreamed that he had been captured and burned at the stake, assisted by his friends went through a mimic representation of burning at the stake, but substituted a dog for his own person. Finally, from the sacrifice, prayer, feast, dance, and ceremony designed to please, placate, and secure the interest of supernatural beings, we find ourselves passing over into the charms, magic formulæ, and observances by which it is believed that his power can be compelled almost independently of his own volition. Such a transition is indicated by the Lillooet belief that cold weather, snow, or rain may be brought on by burning the skin of an animal having control over it.

One of the best discussions of sacrifice among lower races generally is given by Tylor (Primitive Culture, II, 375-410). Material regarding American tribes in particular must be gathered from a large number of works, of which the following are a few: Reports of the Bureau of American Ethnology, Smithsonian Institution, and National Museum; Contributions to North American Ethnology, ix; Memoirs and Bulletins of the American Museum of Natural History; University of California Publications in American Archaeology and Ethnology; Reports of the Peabody Museum of Harvard University; American Anthropologist (old and new series); Journal of American Folk-lore; Reports of the Committee of the British Association for the Advancement of Science to investigate the Northwestern Tribes of Canada, and Reports of the Ethnological Survey of Canada; Transactions of the Royal Society of Canada; Transactions of the Canadian Institute; Jesuit Relations; Thwaites, Early Western Travels; Gatschet, Creek Migration Legend, 1884-88; Adair, History of the American Indians, 1775; Curtis, North American Indian, i-v, 1907-09. Sadammo. Given by Jesus María (Relacion, MS., 1691) as a synonym for Apache. Jesus María and Belisle (Margry, Déc., vi, 344, 1886) evidently heard the same name for Apache when among the Hasinai of Texas. La Harpe, however, makes Sadamons synonymous with Tayos, which would seem to have been a Tonkawa tribe. Perhaps it was a general term for the hostile tribes n. and w. of the Hasinai.

Sadaues. A former rancheria connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.

Sadek-naktie. A principal Onondaga chief and speaker, first mentioned at a council at Onondaga, N. Y., Jan. 29, 1690. His name is variously spelled, and was the national council name. He was speaker at Albany, Feb. 25, 1693, and then announced Gov. Fletcher's name of Cayenquiragoe, or Swift Arrow. He was prominent in the councils of 1698 and 1699, and went to Albany in 1700 through fear of poisoning. Colden thought his lameness a convenient excuse, but he was carried into a council in 1693 by four men. Sakoghsinnakichte (a fuller form of the name) died in 1701, and at his condolence in June another chief bearing the same name was nominated. His name appears in many forms, including Adaquarande, Adaquarondo, Aqueendera, Aqueendero, Aquenderonde, Kaqueendera, Kaqueendero, Sadaganacktie, Sadeganacktie, Sadeganastie, Sadegeenaghtie, Sadekanacktie, Sakoghsinnakichte, Suda-gunachte. (W. M. B.)

Sadekanacktie. An Onondaga chief who succeeded another of that name in 1701, and signed the Beaver land deed of that year and its renewal in 1726. In the first the name is written Sadeganastic; in the second, Sadegeenaghtie, Wolf tribe, his totem being a bent arrow. He made two long speeches at Albany in Aug. 1710, when he was called Kaquendero, but he was not so prominent in council as his predecessor had been. (W. M. B.)

Sadjugahl-lanas (S^sadjū'gal lā'nas). A family of the Eagle clan of the Haida. They claim to be descended from a woman named Hehlu-keingans, along with the Kona-kegawai, Djiguaahl-lanas, Stawashaidagai, and Kaiahl-lanas. Until recently they did not stand very high in the social scale, but owing to his personal popularity their chief in 1901 had become town chief of Masset. This family is said to have had 4 unnamed subdivisions.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 275, 1905.

Sagadahoc (Abnaki: Sangedéhok, 'at the river mouth or outflow.'—Gerard). A village at the mouth of Kennebec r., in Sagadahoc co., Me., in 1614. Kendall, about 1807, found some Indians living at St Francis, Canada, who said they had formerly lived at the mouth of the Kennebec. They were probably a part of the Wewenoc or Arosaguntacook.

Sagakomi. The name of a certain smoking mixture, or substitute for tobacco, applied also to the bearberry bush (Arctostaphylos uva-ursi) or other shrubs the leaves and bark of which are used for the same purpose. The word, which has come into English through Canadian French, is not, as some have supposed (Richardson, Arctic Exped., II, 303, 1851), a corruption of the sac-à-commis of the voyageurs and coureurs de bois of the N. W., but is of Algonquian origin. It is derived from sagākomin, which, in Chippewa and closely related dialects, signifies 'smoking-leaf berry.' The form sagakomi occurs in Lahontan (Voy., II, 53, 1703) and other writers of the early years of the 18th century. (A. F. C.)

Sagamite. A porridge of boiled corn, a favorite dish of the early settlers, derived from the Indians. The word occurs early in Canadian French, being found in Sagard-Théodat (1632), and survives still in Louisiana, whither it was carried from New France. As Cuoq (Lex. Algonq., 15, 1886) points out, the term never meant 'soup' or 'porridge' in the language from which it was taken. The word kisagamite signifies in Nipissing, Chippewa, and closely related Algonquian dialects, 'the broth (agami) is hot' (kisagamiteu, 'it is a hot liquid'—Baraga). In English the word occurs also as sagamity, as in Lewis and Clark (Trav., III, 2, 1817). (A. F. C.)

Sagamore. A corruption of sag'man, the Abnaki name for the chief or ruler of a tribe, the dignity of which was elective, the choice usually falling on an individual who was at the head of a prominent clan. Other spellings are sagomoh (Rosier, 1603), sogomo, sagomo, sagamo, and sagamour. (2) A term applied by early writers to the lesser sachems among the Massachusetts Indians. Josselyn uses the word sagamorship (of which he apparently was the author) as a synonym for sachemship. See Chiefs, Government, Sachem. (W. R. G.)

Sagangusili (Sagā'ñusili). A family belonging to the Raven clan of the Haida. They lived at one time in Naden harbor, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., and are said to have been related to the Skidao-kao.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 271, 1905. Sahāgungūsilī.—Harrison in Proc. Roy. Soc. Can., 125, 1895. Sg'āga'ngailai.—Boas, Twelfth Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898.

Sagarissa. See Sakarissa.

Sagaunash ('Englishman'). A mixed-blood Potawatomi chief, better known as Billy Caldwell, born in Canada about 1780. His father, according to report, was an Irish officer in the British service, and his mother a Potawatomi. Sagaunash was educated in Roman Catholic schools, learned to write English and French with facility, and was master of several Indian dialects. From 1807 to the battle of the Thames in Oct. 1813, he was in the British interest and was intimately associated with Tecumseh, whose secretary he is said to have been. After the battle referred to he transferred his allegiance to the United States, establishing his residence at Chicago in 1820. In 1826 he held the office of justice of the peace, and during the Winnebago excitement of 1827 was, with Shabonee, of great service to the Americans. His wife was a daughter of Neescotnemeg. Sagaunash died at Council Bluffs, Iowa, Sept. 28, 1841, aged about 60 years. (C. T.)

Sagavok. A Netchilirmiut Eskimo village on Boothia penin., s. of Felix harbor. Sagavoq.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888. Shag-a-voko.—Ross, Second Voy., 324, 1835.

Sagawamick. (Chippewa: Shāgawā-mika, 'there is a long shallow place in the lake'; probably a contraction of Shāgawādmikang, 'at the long shallow place in the lake.'—Gerard). The principal village of the Misisagaikaniwininiwak, or Mille Lac band of Chippewa, numbering about 300 persons, situated on the s. shore of Mille Lac, Minn., and during the month of May 1900, consisting of about 30 mat-covered wigwams. The village occupies the site of an ancient settlement of the Mdewakanton (q. v.), who occupied the country until they were driven southward by the Chippewa, probably about the middle of the 18th century. Near the village is a group of more than 60 burial mounds, which, together with fragments of pottery and implements of stone and copper found upon the surface, was considered by the Chippewa to have been of Mdewakanton origin. The Chippewa at the present time utilize these mounds as burial places for their own dead, and on the top and sides of one were 13 ancient graves. Deeply worn trails lead from Sagawamick toward the n., s., and w., and the indications are that the site has long been occupied. (D. I. B.)

Sa-ga-wah-mick.—Bushnell in Science, 408, Sept. 28, 1904.

Sagdlet. A Danish station and Eskimo village on an island off the s. w. coast of Greenland, lat. 60° 15'.—Meddelelser om Grönland, xvi, map, 1896.

Sagdirmiut. An exceedingly primitive Eskimo tribe, having had little intercourse with neighboring people, formerly inhabiting Southampton id. and the islands of Fox basin (Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 444, 451, 1888). In 1900 they were estimated to number about 300, but owing to the establishment of a whaling station on their island soon afterward and the introduction of outside natives with modern guns and superior appliances, by which the food supply of the islanders was quickly destroyed, the Sagdirmiut became extinct by the spring of 1903 (Boas in Am. Anthr., vi, 746, 1904).

Sagem. See Sachem.

Sagenomnas. A tribe of California, apparently of the central portion, and probably about San Joaquin r. It belonged either to the Yokuts (Mariposan) or to the Moquelumnan family.

Sage-nom-nas.—Johnston in Sen. Ex. Doc. 61, 32d Cong., 1st sess., 20, 1852. Sage-nom-nis.—Ryer in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 199, 1853.

Sagewenewak (contr. and abbrev. of Chippewa Sāginawīnīnīwāk, 'people of the river-mouth.'—Gerard. See Saginaw). A Chippewa division living at the mouth of Red r., Manitoba.

Sāgē Wenewak.—Long, Exped. St. Peters R., II, 153, 1824. Sāgitawāwīnīnīwag.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906 (correct name).

Saghwareesa. A Tuscarora chief. Conrad Weiser placed him in his list of influential men in 1752, styling him "the wisest and best Daniel," and calling him Achsaquareesory. He was at Ganatisgoa in the same year, and in 1753 appeared in Pennsylvania. In 1755 he was styled Segwarusa, chief of the Tuscarora; in the following year as Squareesa—the most frequent form. He had a conference with Sir William Johnson at Oneida lake in 1761, was at Onondaga in the same year, and signed the Ft Stanwix treaty in 1768. Zeisberger called him

Shequallisere in 1752. Several chiefs bore the same name. Cf. Sakarissa, Sequareesere. (W. M. B.)

Sagi ('bear'). A Yuchi clan.

Sag^u.—Speck, Yuchi Inds., 70, 1906. Sagítahá.—Gatschet, Uchee MS., B. A. E., 70, 1885 (= 'bear gens').

Sagin. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Saginaw (Ságinawa, 'mouth of a river.'—Gerard. Cf. Saguenay). A former village situated near the present Saginaw, Mich. It was first occupied by the Sauk, and when deserted by that tribe it was settled by a band of Ottawa and Chippewa, known as Saginaw, who continued to reside there until 1837, when they removed beyond the Mississippi. The term was also officially employed to designate all the Chippewa of eastern lower Michigan from Thunder bay southward. (J. M.)

Osaginang.—Kelton, Ft. Mackinac, 9, 1884 (Chippewa name). Oságināwe.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906.

Sagnitaouigama. An Algonkin tribe or band living in 1640 s. w. of Ottawa r. in Ontario (Jes. Rel. 1640, 34, 1868). They were possibly the same as the Sinago.

Sagonaquade ('he angers them'), commonly known as Albert Cusick. A descendant of the Tuscarora chief Nicholas Cusick, but an Onondaga by mother-right. He was born on the Tuscarora res., N. Y., Dec. 25, 1846, and lost his chiefship through being a Christian. He has aided various workers in linguistics and folk-lore, and Horatio Hale esteemed him highly. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Huntington, Oct. 1, 1891, and still lives (1909) on the Onondaga res., N. Y., where he is influential for good. His notes on Indian life are of high value to ethnology. (W. M. B.)

Sagoquas. A Massachusetts village s. of Cohasset, Norfolk co., Mass., in 1614.—Smith (1616) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., vi, 97, 1837.

Sagua-lanas (Sa'gua lá'nas, 'people of the town up the inlet'). A family of the Eagle clan of the Haida. The inlet referred to in their name is probably Virago sd. or Naden harbor. They are said to have branched off from the Tohka-gitunai, but were afterward so closely associated with the Stustas as to be usually regarded among the Stustas families. Their town was Kung, at the entrance of Naden harbor. A subdivision was called Dotuskustl.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 275, 1905.

Sa'gua lá'nas.—Swanton, op. cit. Sak'lá'nas.—Boas, Twelfth Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 22, 1898. Shāgwau Lennas.—Harrison in Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 124, 1895.

Saguarichic (probably 'place of the saguaro,' or giant cactus). A Tarahumare settlement near San Francisco de Borja, in the district of Iturbide, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 323, 1864; Censo del Estado de Chihuahua, 1904.

Saguenay (French corruption of Ságinawa, 'river-mouth,' variously spelled sagina, saguinau, and saguina.—Gerard. Cf. Saginaw). A group of Nascapée bands that lived on Saguenay r., Quebec. Saguenay.—Dutch map (1616) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., i, 1856. Saguenets.—French writer in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., vi, 212, 1859.

Sagui-gitunai (Sagui' gítanā'-i, 'Gitans living up the inlet'). A family of the Eagle clan of the Haida. They originally formed one family with the Djahui-gitinai, but separated from them on account of some internal differences and settled in Masset inlet; hence their name. They occupied half of the town of Kayang, just above Masset. A part of them was called Kialdagwuns.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 274, 1905.

Sagui' gítanā'-i.—Swanton, op. cit. Sagui' gyt'inai'.—Boas, Twelfth Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898. Shāgwikitonē.—Harrison in Proc. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 125, 1895.

Sagui-kun-linagai (Sagui-kun linagā'-i, 'up the inlet point-town people'). A branch of a Haida family called Kunalanas, belonging to the Raven clan.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 271, 1905.

Sagunte. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Sagwaycangwalaghtton. See Sayenquenaghta.

Sa-haidagai (Sa xā'-idaga-i, 'people living on the high ground'). A subdivision of the Stawas-haidagai, a family of the Eagle clan of the Haida, so called from the nature of the ground on which their houses stood.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 273, 1905.

Saheoquiandonqui. See Sequidongquee.

Sahewamish. A Salish division on Hammersly inlet, at the s. end of Puget sd., Wash. Not to be confused with the Sawamish.

Sahawamish.—Stevens in H. R. Ex. Doc. 87, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 45, 1857. Sa-heh-wamish.—U. S. Ind. Treaties, 561, 1873. Sahewamish.—Gibbs quoted by Dall in Cont. N. A. Rep., 170, 1852. Sayhaynamish.—Lane in Sen. Ex. Doc. 52, 31st Cong., 1st sess., 173, 1850. Sayhaywamish.—DeHarley quoted by Schoolcraft, op. cit., v, 700, 1855. Se-hé-hwa-mish.—Tolmie quoted by Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 484, 1855.

Sahldungkun (S^əā'ldāñ kun). A former town of the Sagui-gitunai family of the Haida, on the w. side of Yagun r., at its mouth.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Sahtlilkwu (Saht-lil-kwu). An Okinagan band in Washington.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 413, 1855.

Sahuaripa ('at the [place of the] saguaro,' referring to the Cereus giganteus). A former Jova pueblo, containing also some Opata and Eudeve, situated on an e. branch of Yaqui r., lat. 29° 30', lon. 109°, Sonora, Mexico. It was the seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1627. Pop. 682 in 1678; 150 in 1730. The inhabitants, also called Sahuaripa, probably spoke a language slightly differing from Opata proper. Sahuaripa is now a civilized community of nearly 3,000 inhabitants.

Saguaripa.—Zapata (1678) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., III, 342, 1857. Sahuaripa.—Rivera (1730) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 513, 1884. Samaripa.—Zapata, op. cit., 341 (misprint). Santa María de los Angeles de Saguaripa.—Zapata, op. cit., 344. Sauaripa.—Early doc. quoted by Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 56, 1890. Sta María Sahuaripa.—Catálogo (1658) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 245, 1884.

Saia. The name which the Hupa employ, when speaking to white people, to designate the Athapascans to the s. of themselves, on Mad r. and the tributaries of Eel r., Cal. Through misunderstanding this name was given these people when they were taken prisoners by the military in 1862 and removed to a reservation on Smith r., in what is now Del Norte co., where some of them remained until that reservation was abandoned in 1868. They were then removed to Hupa valley, where, ill-treated by the Hupa, they eked out a pitiful existence for 10 years, finally drifting back to their old neighborhood. They closely resembled the Wailaki in language and customs. Spalding (Ind. Aff. Rep., 82, 1870) gave their population as 27 men and 46 women. In 1877 they were nearly extinct. They were once among the bravest of the California Indians. (P. E. G.)

Moan'-kakhl.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 124, 1877 (Wailaki name). Sai'-az.—Ibid., 122. Siabs.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 139, 1853. Sians.—Ibid. Siaws.—Spalding in Ind. Aff. Rep., 82, 1870. S-yars.—Stevens in Ind. Aff. Rep., 132, 1867.

Saizez. A Takulli village, probably of the Tatshiautin, s. of Nechaco r., Brit. Col., about lat. 53° 55' N., lon. 124° W.

Sai'kez.—Morice in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., x, 109, 1892. Sy-cus.—Harmon, Jour., 202, 1820.

Sailupsun. A body of Salish of Cowichan agency, Brit. Col.; pop. 69 in 1896, including the Puntlatsh and Comox, but no longer separately enumerated.

Pail-uk-sun.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1894, 278, 1895. Sailk-sun.—Ibid., 1884, 188, 1885. Sail-up-sun.—Ibid., 1895, 360, 1896.

Saint. For additional saint names, see the Synonymy at the end of this volume.

Saint Andre. A dependency of the Mission des Apôtres which was founded in 1640 and abandoned in the following year; situated in one of the 9 towns of the Tionontati, an Iroquoian tribe inhabiting the hill country s. and s. w. of Nottawasaga bay, in Grey, Bruce, and Huron counties, Ontario. The only known reference to this mission is given in the Jesuit Relation for 1640, 95, ed. 1858.

Saint Anne. A Malecite mission in 1760 on an island in St John r., near the present Frederickton, N. B.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 154, 1855.

Saint Antoine. A Huron village in 1640, and one of the dependencies of Mission de la Conception, established among the Bear tribe; situated probably in Simcoe co., Ontario (Jes. Rel. 1640, 78, 1858). Nothing is known of its history or of its exact position. (J. N. B. H.)

Saint Augustine. A Nascapee and Montagnais station at the mouth of St Augustine r., on the n. shore of St Lawrence gulf, Quebec.

Sainte Elisabeth. An Algonquian village among the Hurons in Ontario in the 17th century.

Sainte Elisabeth.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 90, 1858.

Saint Francis. A Catholic mission village, occupied principally by Abnaki, on St Francis r., near Pierreville, Yamaska district, Quebec. After the removal of the Christian Indians hither from Chaudiere r. they received constant accessions from the Abnaki and Pennacook, especially the former, who had been driven out of New England by the advance of the English settlements. After the death of Père Rasles in 1724 the greater part of the Abnaki fled to St Francis, which thus became an Abnaki village. The Arosaguntacook acquired the leading position, and their dialect is that now used in the village. At the beginning of the French and Indian war in 1754 a large number of the hostile Scaticook joined the settlement. As the St Francis Indians had been driven from their homes, they retaliated upon the New England settlers at every opportunity and soon became noted as the bitterest enemies of the English colonies. In 1759 a force was organized and sent under Maj. Rogers against the village, which then contained about 700 inhabitants. St Francis was surprised and burned, 200 of the Indians—men, women, and children—being killed, and the remainder scattered. These afterward returned, and the village was rebuilt, but the fall of the French power in America put an end to further hostility on the part of the Indians. A number of them joined the British forces in the Revolution, and again in the War of 1812.

They numbered 360 in 1821, 387 in 1858, 335 in 1908, and 293 in 1909. They still spend a great part of their time in hunting, as well as in making and selling baskets, moccasins, and other Indian wares. See Missions. (J. M.)

Alsigontegok.—J. D. Prince, inf'n, 1906 (present Abnaki name). Arsikantekok.—Ibid. (old Abnaki name). NessaSakamighé.—Rasles (1691), Abnaki Dict., 458, 1833 ('where fish is dried by smoke': Abnaki name). Saint-François.—Kendall, Trav., II, 53, 1809. S. François de Sales.—Le Sueur (1734) quoted by Kendall, ibid., 294. St. Francis.—Chauvignerie (1736) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IX, 1052, 1855. St. Francis de Sales.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 142, 1855. St. Francis.—Clinton (1745) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., VI, 281, 1855. St. François.—Albany conf. (1724), ibid., V, 713, 1855. Saint François du Lac.—Jes. Rel., LXXI, 311, 1901. Skensowahneron.—Cuoq., Lex., 155, 1882 ('people at St Francis,' from skensowah, a corruption of St François, ne 'at', ronon 'people': Caughnawaga name). Za Plasua.—Wzokhilain quoted by Pilling. Bibl. Algonq. Lang., 539, 1891 (Abnaki pronunciation of "St. Francis").

Saint Francis. A mission village founded in 1683 by some Algonkin and Montagnais converts from Sillery at the falls of Chaudière r., Beauce district, Quebec. They were soon joined by the remaining inhabitants of Sillery, which was then abandoned. In 1700 they removed to the new village.

St. François de Sales.—Jes. Rel., LXIII, 123, 1901.

Saint Francis. A Menominee mission established in 1844 on Wolf r. or L. Poygan, Winnebago co., Wis., and abandoned in 1852 on the removal of the tribe to a reservation in Shawano co., where the new mission of St Michael was established.

Saint Francis Xavier. A French Catholic mission established by Bruyas in 1667 at the Oneida village of Ganowarohare.

Saint Francis Xavier. A Jesuit mission established by Allouez in 1669 at a village of Miami and Mascoutens on Fox r., Wis., near De Pere, Brown co., where the Mascoutens had a village a few m. from Green bay. Among the Indians attached to it were Miami, Mascoutens, Illinois, Kickapoo, Sauk, Foxes, Potawatomi, and Winnebago.

Saint Francis Xavier. A former mission, established in 1852 among the Chippewa on Mille Lacs, Aitkin co., Minn.

Mascoutens.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 372, 1855.

Saint George. An Aleut village on St George id., Pribilof group, Alaska. The inhabitants, who tend the fur seals, were brought originally from Atka and Unalaska. Pop. 88 in 1880, 92 in 1890. See Petroff, 10th Census, Alaska, 23, 1884.

Saint Helena. A large island off the coast of Beaufort co., S. C., taking its name from the Spanish post of Santa Elena established there by Menendez in 1566. The Indians were among those known collectively as Cusabo (q. v.), and were probably of the Muskhogean stock. In 1684 "the queen of St Helena" made sale of lands to the English. (J. M.)

Saint Ignace. A Huron mission established by Marquette in 1670 on Mackinac

id., Mich., but which was removed soon after to Pt Ignace, on the mainland to the N. St. Ignace.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 364, 1855.

Saint Jacques.—Lamberville (1673) in Jes. Rel., LVIII, 21, 1899.

Saint Jacques et Saint Philippe. A village of the Tionontati (q. v.) in Ontario in 1640.

Saint Jacques et saint Philippe.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 95, 858.

Saint Jean. The chief town of the Wolf clan or phratry of the Tionontati in 1649, in which the Jesuit fathers had maintained a mission for some years; situated probably in the hill country of Bruce co., Ontario, on the E. frontier of the Tionontati territory, fronting their enemies, the Iroquois. According to the Jesuit Relation for 1650 (p. 8, ed. 1858) this town contained 500 or 600 families, which, following the rate of $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 8 persons to a family (ibid., p. 3), would give a total population of 3,750 to 4,800, apparently a rather high estimate. In Nov. 1649 the Jesuit fathers then resident on Christian id., Georgian bay, Canada, learned from two Huron converts who had just escaped from a band of 300 Iroquois warriors that the enemy was undecided whether to attack the Tionontati or the Jesuit fathers and their converts on the island. This information was conveyed to the Tionontati, who received the news with joy, for, exulting in their prowess, they regarded the hostile troop as already conquered. Having awaited the attack of the Iroquois for some days, the Tionontati, and especially the men of St Jean, resolved, on Dec. 5, to go against the enemy lest they escape; but the Iroquois having learned from two captives the practically defenseless condition of St Jean, hastened to attack it before the return of its warriors, whom they had failed to meet. On Dec. 7 they appeared before the town, set fire to the bark cabins, and slaughtered the defenseless inhabitants. According to the Jesuit Relation for 1650, Father Garnier refused to attempt to escape, but ran everywhere to give absolution to the Christians he met, and to seek in the burning cabins the children, the sick, and the neophytes, whom he baptized. While thus engaged he was shot twice, and later his skull was crushed by hatchet blows. In the Récit d'un Ami de l'Abbé de Gallinée (Margry, Déc., I, 366, 1875) it is said that before being killed, Father Garnier shot 3 Iroquois with a gun. Two days later the Tionontati warriors returned to find their town in ashes, and the mutilated bodies of

S. Jean Baptiste.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 90, 1858.

Saint Joachim. A mission village among the Hurons in Ontario in 1640.

S. Joachim.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 90, 1858.

Saint Joseph. A Cayuga mission established in New York by the French in 1688.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 261, 1855.

Saint Joseph. A Potawatomi mission established by Allouez about 1688 on St Joseph r., near the s. end of L. Michigan. The mission and the river gave rise to the designation "Saint Joseph Indians," and "Potawatomis of St. Joseph's." See Shea, Cath. Miss., 375, 1855; Croghan (1765) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., vii, 786, 1856.

Saint Mark. A mission established by Allouez about 1670 among the Foxes of Wolf r., Wis.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 365, 1855.

Saint Mary. A former Potawatomi mission and village on the n. bank of Kansas r., in Pottawatomie co. Kan. The mission was established by the Jesuits on Pottawatomie cr., Miami co., in 1838, but was removed to Linn co. in the following year, thence in 1847-48 to its final site. Under the act of Nov. 15, 1861, 320 acres of land, including the church, schools, and fields, were set apart for the mission's use. It continued to be a mission school until 1869.

Saint Michael. A town on an island of the same name, s. coast of Norton sd., Alaska, where the Russians in 1833 established a stockaded post. Pop. 109 in 1880, 101 in 1890.

Micháelovski Redoubt.—Dall, Alaska, 9, 1870. Redoubt St. Michael.—Baker, Geog. Dist. Alaska, 543, 1906.

Saint Michael. A Jesuit mission existing in 1658 at a Potawatomi village in s. Wisconsin, containing about 3,000 inhabitants, including about 500 fugitive Tionontati.

Saint-Michel.—Jes. Rel. 1658, 21, 1858.

Saint Michael. A Menominee mission established in 1852 on Shawano lake, Shawano co., Wis., on the removal of the tribe from Poygan lake.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 393, 1855. See Saint Francis.

Saint Michaels. A Franciscan mission among the Navaho in the n. e. corner of Arizona, just s. of the Navaho res. line, about 3 m. w. of the New Mexico boundary, and 27 m. n. w. of Gallup, N. Mex. It is situated in a well-watered valley called by the Navaho Tsohotso ('large meadow'), and by the early Spaniards Cienega Amarilla ('yellow swamp', or 'yellow meadow'), probably on account of the numerous yellow flowers that flourish there toward the end of summer. The mission had its inception in 1896, when the site was purchased for $3,000 by the late Rev. J. A. Stephan, director of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, with funds supplied by Rev. Mother Katharine Drexel, foundress of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament. On Oct. 13, 1897, Rev. Juvenal Schnorbus was placed in charge, assisted by Rev. Anselm Weber, and the lay-brother Placidus Buerger. Arriving at Tsohotso, Oct. 11, 1898, the fathers changed the name to St Michaels, and almost immediately the task of reducing the Navaho language to writing was begun. In 1900 Father Schnorbus was transferred to Cincinnati, Father Weber becoming his successor, with Rev. Leopold Ostermann and Rev. Berard Haile as assistants. In May 1901 Mother Katharine purchased two ranches contiguous to the mission for $4,000, increasing the mission lands to 440 acres, about one-half of which is suitable for agriculture. In March of the following year the erection of a commodious school building was commenced, and was finished in December, with accommodations for 150 pupils. Much of the laboring work in connection with the new building was done by the Indians. At the time of the opening 57 pupils were enrolled; the next year there were 87, in 1906 the number had increased to 118, and in 1908 to 127. The pupils are instructed in the Christian faith in their own tongue by the fathers. A community of 13 Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament have charge of the school and are making marked progress, the Navaho children bearing fair comparison with white children in intelligence. At the present writing (1908) more than 100 children at their own request and with the consent of their parents were baptized after due instruction. In 1903 a new residence and a chapel were erected, and a post-office has been established at the mission. A Navaho ethnologic dictionary, by the fathers, was published by the St Michaels Press in 1910.

Saint Paul. An Aleut village on the Pribilof id. of that name, settled with natives of other islands employed in carling for the fur seals. Pop. 298 in 1880, 244 in 1890. See Petroff, 10th Census, Alaska, 23, 1884.

Saint Regis. A settlement of Catholic Iroquois, situated on the s. bank of the St Lawrence, at the boundary between the United States and Canada, with a reservation extending several miles along the river on both sides of the line. They call the place Akwesasne, 'where the partridge drums,' referring to sounds made by a cascade at that point. The village was established about 1755, during the French and Indian war, by a party of Catholic Iroquois from Caughnawaga, Quebec, and it became the seat of the Jesuit mission of Saint Francis Regis. The village rapidly increased in population, and in 1806 received a considerable part of those who had been driven from Oswegatchie. When the boundary between the two countries was surveyed the village was found to be thereon, and since then a part of the reservation has been under control of the United States, while the rest is under the Canadian government. The St. Regis Indians numbered 2,850 in 1909, having 1,501 in Quebec and 1,349 in New York. They have sometimes been known as "Praying Indians," and formed a part of the "Seven Nations of Canada." Sakamna. An Utkiavinmiut Eskimo summer village inland from Pt Barrow, Alaska.—Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 83, 1892.

Sakapatayi (Sa-ka-pa-ta'-yi, probably referring to water-lilies covering the surface of a pond). A former Upper Creek town on a tributary of Hatchet cr., Coosa co., Ala., at a place now called Socopathy. (A. S. G.)

Sakapatayi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 143, 1884. Sakapat'i-l.—Ibid. (sometimes so pronounced by Creeks). Sack-o-par-tay.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, IV, 578, 1854.

Sakarissa ('Spear-dragger'). A Tuscarora chief who attended the Canandaigua treaty of 1794. He was probably the Oghshigwarise present at Niagara Landing in 1789, and Osequirison at Queenstown in 1813. The chief Sakarissa was one of the founders of the Tuscarora Congregational church in 1805, and accompanied Solomon Longbeard in 1802 to North Carolina, where land claims were settled. At Canandaigua the Quakers said: "He appears to be a thoughtful man, and mentioned a desire he had, that some of our young men might come among them as teachers." See Elias Johnson, Six Nations, 134, 1881; Savery, Journal, 359, 1837. Cf. Saghuureesa, Sequareesere. (W. M. B.)

Sakaweston. An Indian seized by Capt. Harlow in 1611 from one of the islands off the coast of New England, who, after he had lived many years in England, went as a soldier to the wars in Bohemia, as Capt. John Smith relates.

Sakawithiniwuk ('people of the woods'). The Wood Cree, one of the several divisions of the Cree. They are divided into the Sakittawawithiniwuk and the Athabaskawithiniwuk.

Sakayengwalaghton. See Sayenqueraghta.

Sakeyu (Sä-ke-yu). A prehistoric pueblo of the Tewa on a mesa w. of the Rio Grande in n. New Mexico, between San Ildefonso pueblo and Rito de los Frijoles (Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 78, 1892). Possibly the same as Tsankawi (q. v.).

Sakhanwotung ('the mouth of a creek where one resides'). A former small village of Delawares who moved from New Jersey about 1737; situated on the w. bank of Delaware r., near the site of Allen Ferry, about 7 m. below the Gap, in Northampton co., Pa. It was visited by Zinzendorf in 1742. David Brainerd built a cabin at this place in 1744, when he was preaching to the Indians "at the Forks." At that time he had about 30 or 40 Indians present at the services, and the following year baptized Moses Tatem, who had acted as his interpreter. Brainerd preached here for the last time Feb. 23, 1746. Consult Brodhead, Delaware Water Gap, 1867; Memoirs of Rev. David Brainerd, 1822; Memorials of Moravian Church, 1870. (G. P. D.)

Sakhones.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Sakiaqjung.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Saki-kegawai (Sa'ki qé'gawa-i, 'those born up the inlet'). A prominent family of the Eagle clan of the Haida. They belonged to the Gunghet-haidagai, or Ninstints people, and were said to be a part of the Gunghet-kegawai. Their chief was town chief of Ninstints, which received its name among the whites from one of his names, Nungstins (Nan stins, 'One who is two').—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 272, 1905.

Sakittawawithiniwuk ('people of the mouth of the river.'—W. J.). A subdivision of the Sakawithiniwuk, or Wood Cree.

Sakoghsinnakichte. See Sadekanaktie.

Saksinahmahyiks (Sak-si-nah'-mah-yiks, 'short bows'). A subtribe of the Kainah.—Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 209, 1892.

Sakta (Sáqta). A Bellacoola town on the n. side of the mouth of Bellacoola r., Brit. Col. It was one of the 8 Nuhalk villages.—Boas in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 49, 1898.

Sakuma. A band formerly inhabiting the lower Colorado valley in the present Arizona or California, who were conquered, absorbed, or driven out by the Mohave.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folklore, II, 185, 1889.

Sakumehu. A Salish division on the headwaters of Skagit r., Wash., numbering 250 in 1852. The remnant is now on Swinomish res.

Sakutenedi (Saq'té'nedi, 'grass people'). A Tlingit division at Kake, Alaska, belonging to the Raven clan. (J. R. S.)

Salabi. The Spruce clan of the Kachina phratry of the Hopi.

Salab wiñwü.—Fewkes in 19th Rep., B. A. E., 584, 1900 (wiñwü = 'clan'). Salab' wüñ-wü.—Fewkes in Am. Anthr., VII, 404, 1894.

Salachi. A Chumashan village formerly near Purísima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal. Twice mentioned in mission archives; seemingly two villages of the same name.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Salal. A berry-bearing evergreen plant (Gaultheria shallon) of the Columbia r. region, the fruit of which has been an important source of food for the Indians; written also sallal, the name of this fruit in the Chinook jargon, from Chinook k'kwu-shalla. (A. F. C.)

Salan Pomo. A name given by Ford (Ind. Aff. Rep. 1856, 257, 1857), in the form Salan Pomas, as that of a division of the Pomo which inhabited Potter valley, Mendocino co., Cal. It is probable that this name is a corruption of Shanel, the name of one of the largest of the old villages in this valley. (S. A. B.)

Salapaque. One of the tribes of w. Texas, some at least of whose people were neophytes of the mission of San José y San Miguel de Aguayo.—Texas State archives, Nov. 1790.

Salem. A village of the Moravian Delawares, established in 1781 on the w. bank of Tuscarawas r., 1½ m. s. w. of Port Washington, Tuscarawas co., Ohio. The Indians were driven out during the Revolution, but returned after the war. The mission was abandoned in 1781. (J. M.)

Salendas (S'ala'ndas). A family of the Eagle clan of the Haida; one of those that migrated to Alaska. One branch settled among the Tongass and another at Sitka, while the Haida portion became subdivided into two house groups, the Hlimul-naas-hadai and the Nahawas-hadai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905. S'ala'ndas.—Boas, Twelfth Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 22, 1898.

Salinan Family. A linguistic stock of California, named by Latham (1856) and Powell (1891) from Salinas r. The Salinan Indians inhabited parts of San Luis Obispo, Monterey, and perhaps San Benito cos., their territory extending from the sea to the main ridge of the Coast range and from the head of the Salinas drainage to a short distance above Soledad. Little is known about them; no name for themselves as a body, for their language, or for any division, either in their own or in any other Indian language, is known; nor is it known what any such divisions may have been. The name of the place at which the mission of San Miguel was established was Vahia, or Vatica, and that of the mission of San Antonio, Sextapay. The Tatche (Tachi) or Telame Indians, mentioned by Duflot de Mofras as at San Antonio, are Yokuts tribes that were brought to that mission. Cholame cr. and town in San Luis Obispo co. possibly take their name from a Salinan word, and the same may be the case with Jolon in Monterey co.

The missions of San Antonio and San Miguel (q. v.) were established in Salinan territory in 1771 and 1797. The total baptisms at these missions reached 4,400 and 2,400 respectively, and it appears that these numbers included Yokuts. Like all the other tribes, the Salinan Indians decreased rapidly during mission times, the numbers at each mission having fallen to fewer than 700 by 1831, and more rapidly after secularization. At present their total number is perhaps 20, most of them near Jolon. See California Indians, Mission Indians, Missions.

The Salinan language is very irregular in its structure and more complex than most languages of California. Two dialects, those of San Antonio and San Miguel, which do not differ much, are known, and it is probable that there were others. The Salinan Indians appear to have lived in houses of brush or grass and to have had no canoes. They hunted more than they fished, but depended for their subsistence principally on vegetal food, such as acorns and grass seed. They used stone mortars and coiled baskets, and burned the dead. Of their religion and mythology nothing is known, except that they regarded the eagle, the coyote, and the humming-bird as creators. (H. W. H. A. L. K.)

× Runsians.—Keane in Stanford's Compend., Cent. and S. Am., 476, 1878 (San Miguel of his group belongs here). —Salinan.—Powell in 7th Rep. B. A. E., 101, 1891. < Salinas.—Latham in Trans. Philol. Soc. Lond., 85, 1856. > San Antonio.—Powell in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 568, 1877. < Santa Barbara.—Gatschet in Mag. Am. Hist., 157, 1877 (cited here as containing San Antonio); Gatschet in U. S. Geog. Surv. W. 100th Mer., VII, 419, 1879 (contains San Antonio and San Miguel). > Sextapay.—Taylor quoted by Shea, Lib. Am. Ling., VII, VII, 1861.

Salinas. Mentioned by Rivera (Diario, leg. 2602, 1736) as a tribe or village apparently near the lower Rio Grande in Texas. It was possibly Coahuiltecan.

Salineros. A Spanish collective designation for the Piro and Tigua occupying, until 1675–80, the pueblos of Abo, Chilili, Quarai, Tabira, Tenabo, etc., near the salt lagoons E. of the Rio Grande, central New Mexico. See also Chealo, Tompiros. Salineros.—Benavides, Memorial (1630), in Land of Sunshine, XIV, 46, 1901. Salmeros.—Benavides misquoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 164, 1889.

Salineta. Probably a pueblo of the Piro or the Tigua, 4 leagues from Guadalupe mission at El Paso, in the present Texas, in 1680.—Otermin (1680) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 182, 1889.

Salish (Okinagan: sälst, 'people'). Formerly a large and powerful division of the Salishan family, to which they gave their name, inhabiting much of w. Montana and centering around Flathead lake and valley. A more popular designation for this tribe is Flatheads, given to them by the surrounding people, not because they artificially deformed their heads, but because, in contradistinction to most tribes farther w., they left them in their natural condition, flat on top. They lived mainly by hunting. The Salish, with the cognate Pend d'Oreille and the Kutenai, by treaty of Hell Gate, Mont., July 16, 1855, ceded to the United States their lands in Montana and Idaho. They also joined in the peace treaty at the mouth of Judith r., Mont., Oct. 17, 1855. Lewis and Clark estimated their population in 1806 to be 600; Gibbs gave their probable number in 1853 as 325, a dimi-

Salishan Family. A linguistic family inhabiting the N. portions of Washington, N. Idaho, W. Montana, a small strip of the N. W. coast of Oregon, and in Canada the S. E. part of Vancouver id. from Thurlow id. to Sooke bay, and all the S. mainland of British Columbia as far as Bute inlet and Quessnelle lake, with the exception of that portion held by the Kutenai, although within the Kutenai area, at the Columbia lakes, is a small settlement of Salish.. An isolated division of the family, the Bellacoola, had established itself farther N. on Dean inlet, Burke channel, and Bellacoola r. The name Salish was originally applied to a large tribe in W. Montana popularly known as Flatheads, thence it was finally extended to cover all those speaking a similar language.

Although lexically distinct from one another, the Salish, Chimakuan, and Wakashan languages belong to the same structural type and have remote points of resemblance with Algonquian. Physically and culturally the coast and interior Salish belong to different groups, the former being affiliated to some extent with the other coast people to the N., and the interior Salish resembling interior stocks in their own neighborhood.

If his own statements may be relied upon, Juan de Fuca (1592) was probably the first white man to visit the country inhabited by people of this family. After his time several Spanish navigators passed along their coasts, but their position exposed them less frequently to visits from vessels than that of the Nootka and tribes farther N. Later British and American vessels came to trade, the most notable expedition being that of Geo. Vancouver (1792-94), whose name became attached to Vancouver id. The first detailed information regarding the Salishan tribes was obtained, however, from the account of the expedition of Lewis and Clark (1804-06), and knowledge of them was extended by the establishment of Astor's fort in 1811 at the mouth of the Columbia, although the fort itself was not within Salish territory. From that time until 1846 most of this region, known as the Oregon Territory, was a subject of dispute between Great Britain and the United States, and it was not until after its settlement and until the California gold fever had somewhat subsided that settlers began to come into this region in numbers. On the Canadian side employees of the Hudson's Bay Company were among the first to enter the country. The establishment of a post at Victoria in 1843 was one of the most momentous events to the Indians of the entire coast.

The coast Salish form the southern arm of the N. W. Coast culture, which fades away southward from Bute inlet and Comox (where it resembles that of the more highly developed Kwakiutl) to the semi-Californian Tillamook and the Nestucca of Oregon. Unlike the more northern Haida, Tlingit, and Tsimshian, descent is usually reckoned through the father.

The Salish dwellings in the northern part of this area are of the Nootka type, longer than those farther n., and containing several families each with its own fire. They are also built in the same way of heavy planks and beams. They resemble the other coast tribes in the important part fish and shellfish play in their diet, and in the extent to which canoes are employed. The interior Salish depended more on hunting, but so many large salmon streams flow through this country that even they were more given to a fish diet than were the interior tribes generally. The houses of the interior Salish of British Columbia differed considerably from those on the coast. To construct them, holes were dug and poles set up in conical form around their edges; the whole was covered with poles on which was laid grass, and sometimes cedar bark, and over all earth was thrown.

War, slavery, and the potlatch (q. v.) were regular institutions on the coast. One of the most characteristic customs, especially prevalent along the coasts of Washington and British Columbia, was artificial head-flattening, but it did not obtain, curiously enough, among the Indians now called Flatheads (see Salish).

Population (1909): Coast Salish in United States, 3,600; coast Salish in Canada, 4,874; total, 8,474. Interior Salish in United States, 4,988; interior Salish in Canada, 5,390; total, 10,378. Total Salish in United States, 8,366; total Salish in Canada, 10,264; grand total, 18,630.

The Salishan dialects may be grouped as follows:

I. DIALECTS OF THE INTERIOR: 1, Lillooet in w. British Columbia; 2, Nlaka-pamuk (Thompson Indians) in s. w. British Columbia; 3, Shuswap in s. central British Columbia; 4, Okinagan in s. e. British Columbia, extending into the United States, the subdivisions of which are the Okinagan proper, Colville, Nespelem or Sanpoil, Senijextee (Snaichekstik) of the Arrow lakes and Columbia r. below the lakes; 5, Flathead in e. Washington, Idaho, and Montana, subdivisions of which are the Spokane, Kalispel or Pend d'Oreilles, and Salish or Flathead; 6, Skitswish or Cœur d'Alènes in n. Idaho; 7, Columbia groups in the w. part of the interior of Washington, including the Pisuow or Wenatchi, Sinkiuse, Methow, and other local divisions.

II. COAST DIALECTS: 8, Bellacoola, a group of tribes on Bentinck Arm and Deans inlet, Brit. Col.; 9, Comox group on the s. part of the Gulf of Georgia, with two subdivisions—(a) the Comox proper, including the Comox and Eëksen, Homalko, Kaäke, Kakekt, Seechelt of Jervis inlet, Sliammon, and Tatpoös; and (b) the Puntlatsh, including the Hwawatl, Puntlatsh, and Saämen; 10, Comichan group in the neighborhood of Nanaimo on Vancouver id., and in the delta of Fraser r. It embraces, on Vancouver id., the Clemclemalats, Comiakin, Hellet, Kenipsim, Kilpanlus, Koksilah, Kulleets, Lilmalche, Malakut, Nanaimo, Penelakut, Quamichan, Siccaneen, Snownas, Somenos, Tateke, Yekolaos; and, in the Fraser valley, the Chehalis, Chilli-wack, Coquitlam, Ewawoos, Kateey, Kelatl, Kwantlen, Matsqui, Musqueam, Nehalmoken, Nicomen, Ohamil, Pilalt, Popkum, Samahquam, Scowlitz, Sewathen, Siyita, Skwawalooks, Snokweametl, Squawtits, Sumass, and Tsakuum; 11, Squawmish group, including the Squawmish of Burrard inlet and Howe sd. and probably the Nooksak of n. Washington; 12, Songish group, on Juan de Fuca str., San Juan id., and parts of the coasts of Washington and British Columbia. It includes the Clallam (Wash.), Lummi (Wash.), Samish (Wash.), Sanetch (Brit. Col.), Semiahmoo (Brit. Col. and Wash.), Songish (Brit. Col.), Sooke (Brit. Col.); 13, Nisqualli group, embracing all tribes e. of Puget sd. and s. to Mt Tacoma, and, on the west side, the region up to Olympia, except Hood canal. It includes two dialectic divisions, the Nisqualli and the Snohomish. Well-known divisions are the Nisqualli proper, Dwamish, Puyallup, Skagit, Snoqualmu or Snoquamish, and Squaxon. Following are the names of some of the numerous bands of the Nisqualli: Etakmehu, Kwehtlmamish (?), Nukwatsamish, Nusehtsatl, Potoashees, Sahewamish, Sakumehu, Samamish, Sawamish, Sekamish, Shomanish, Shotlemamish, Skihwamish, Skopamish, Smulkamish, Squacum, Stehtsasamish, Steila-coomamish, Suquamish, and Towah-hah. Other bands which may belong here, but which cannot be identified, are Neutubvig, Nuchwugh, Opichiken, Sinslikhooish, Sintootoolish, and Sktehl-mish; 14, Twana group, on Hood canal, Puget sd., including the Twana and Sailupsun; 15, Chehalis group, embracing six dialects, which show considerable variation. These are the Quinault and Quaitso of n. w. Washington; the Humptulips of the n. part of Grays harbor; the Lower Chehalis of Grays harbor and Shoalwater bay; the Satsop e. and n. e. of Grays harbor; the Upper Chehalis e. of Shoalwater bay; and the Cow-litz on the river of that name southward to Columbia r.; 16, Tillamook on the coast of Oregon, including the Tillamook or Nestucca, and the Siletz. Tillamook is the Chinook name for the tribe whose territory is called in Chinook, Nehalem.

Salsona. Mentioned as a Costanoan division hostile to those Indians among whom Dolores mission at San Francisco, Cal., was established. In 1776 the latter, being attacked by the Salsona, fled to the islands in the bay or to the eastern shore. The Salsona are said to have lived 6 leagues to the s. e., which would put them near San Mateo. They may be identical with the Olhones. See Engelhardt, Franc. in Cal., 295, 1897.

Salt. Not all tribes of Indians were accustomed to use salt, whether from the difficulty of procuring it, the absence of the habit, a repugnance for the mineral, or for religious reasons, it is not always possible to say. Salt was eaten as a condiment, the only instance of its use as a preservative being its addition to yeast to prevent putrefaction. The desire for salt is presumed to arise from a physiological need, and it is thought that the demand for it is greatest when cereal or vegetal food is eaten, and decreases as the diet is more and more of animal substance. Baegert says the tribes of Lower California ate "everything unsalted, though they might obtain plenty of salt," and gives as a reason that since they moved about constantly, salt was too cumbersome to carry with them. The Gabrieleños of s. California used salt sparingly; the Hupa, the Achomawi, and perhaps other California Indians, do not eat salt; the Eskimo regard it as an abomination, while the Achomawi believe its use in food would cause sore eyes (Dixon). The Creeks tabooed its use in the busk ceremony until after the ball play (Speck). Other tribes used substitutes for salt, as the Karankawa of Texas, who, Gatschet says, used chile instead; and the Virginia Indians, who made a form of lye by burning to ashes the stalk of a certain plant. "They season their broth with it, and they know no other salt," says Capt. John Smith. The Cherokee used lye, and even now among the Eastern Cherokee salt is almost unused by them. Indeed it is probable that none of the Southern tribes used salt before the coming of the whites. According to Hariot, the people of Roanoak used as a condiment the saline ashes of a plant taken to be orage, and resembling the meldon of the Germans (Atriplex patulum), a species of saltwort, which runs into many varieties and is common to Europe and America. All the Algonquian names for salt are formed from a root meaning "to be sour" or "acid." There is no root "to be saline." The water of the ocean was known as "sour water."

Salt exists in enormous quantities in the United States, and it was not difficult for the Indians to obtain it. The Omaha took up salt incrustations with feathers and transferred it to bags, or broke up rock salt with sticks and pounded it to the desired fineness. The source of their supply was near Lincoln, Nebr., and the headwaters of a stream s. w. of Republican r., probably Saline r., Kans. The Shawnee were famed as salt makers, and the great spring on Saline cr., below the mouth of Walnut cr., on the Ohio, was purchased from them by treaty. The large vessels of very thick pottery found near the salines and elsewhere are found to have been used as evaporating pans by the Indians. The Quapaw made salt from the water of saline springs near the mouth of Arkansas r., evaporating it in earthen pans made for the purpose, which left the salt formed into square cakes (Giddings). C. C. Jones says: "The Knight of Elvas informs us that natural salt and the sand with which it was intermixed were thrown into baskets made for the purpose. These were large at the mouth and small at the bottom, or, in other words, funnel-shaped. Beneath them—suspended in the air on a ridge pole—vessels were placed. Water was then poured upon the admixture of sand and salt. The drippings were strained and boiled on the fire until all the water was evaporated, and the salt left in the bottom of the pots." Fragments of these leaching baskets have been found in the salt deposits of Petit Anse id., La. An important salt-making site was uncovered in 1902 by the Peabody Museum at Kimmswick, Mo., where the salt pans were found in place (Bushnell).

The Rio Grande Pueblos acquired salt principally from the Manzano salines, in central New Mexico; the Zuñi obtained their supply from a salt lake many miles s. w. of their pueblo. There was early discrimination by the Pueblos in the quality of salt, and long journeys were made to obtain the best kind. In this pursuit many trails led to the Zuñi salt lake, where a number of towns were built by a tribe or tribes which were exterminated by the Zuñi immediately anterior to the advent of the Spaniards in 1539-40. The salt naturally deposited from the supersaturated waters of the Zuñi salt lake was collected and carried long distances to the settlements, having been found, it is said, in cliff-ruins in s. Colorado, 200 m. from the source of supply. Among the Pueblos, pottery vessels of special form were used to contain salt, and mortuary vessels which contained food for the dead are frequently saturated with this substance, causing exfoliation of the surface of the ware.

The Navaho myth of the origin of Dsilydje Qaçal relates that "next day they traveled up the stream to a place called Tse'çqáka, and here again they halted for the night. This place is noted for its deposits of native salt. The travelers cut some out from under a great rock and filled with it their bags, made out of the skins of the squirrels and other small animals which they had captured" (Matthews).

The Hopi have obtained their salt from time immemorial from the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, westward from their villages about 100 m. Here salt is gathered with ceremony by making sacrifice to the Goddess of Salt and the God of War, whose shrines are there (Fewkes). The Pueblos have important salt deities, that of the Hopi being Huring Wuhti, "The Woman of the Hard Substances," who was a sea deity, like the Mexican salt goddess Huitocilmatl. The myth concerning the latter relates that she was sister of the rain gods, with whom she quarreled; in their resentment they drove her to salt water, where she invented the art of panning the mineral and became Goddess of Salt. The Zúñi "Salt Mother" was Mawe, genius of the sacred salt lake. At certain seasons war parties were sent to the lake for salt, and while there ceremonies were performed and offerings made. Salt Chuck Indians (Chinook jargon: salt-tchuk, 'salt-water'). A general term applied indiscriminately to coast tribes by inland Indians in the N. W. In 1884, J. O. Dorsey, when at Siletz agency, Oreg., heard this term applied, not only by the inland tribes (as Takelma) to the coast peoples (Athapascan, Kusan, etc.), but even by Athapascans to themselves. See Fitzhugh in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1857, 329, 1858.

Saltketchers. A former Yuchi village in s. South Carolina, about the present Salkehatchie. It seems to have been a village of the Yamasee at the time of the war with that tribe in 1715.

Salt Lick. A village, probably of the Delawares, on Mahoning cr., near Warren, Trumbull co., Ohio, about 1760 (Croghan (1760) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., ix, 289, 1871). The "old salt works" here were operated by the whites before the survey of the E. part of the Western Reserve in 1796. In 1800 the chief of the settlement, "Captain George," was killed during a fight with settlers (Howe, Hist. Coll. Ohio, ii, 659, 1896).

Saltwater Pond. A village in 1685, probably in Plymouth co., Mass.—Hinckley (1685) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., v, 133, 1861.

Saluda. A small tribe formerly living on Saluda r., S. C. According to Rivers (Hist. S. C., 38, 1856) they removed to Pennsylvania probably early in the 18th century, which, if true, would indicate that they were probably connected with the Shawnee. In addition to that of the river, the name survives in Saluda gap in the Blue Ridge.

Salutation. In general Indian salutation was accompanied by less demonstration than is usual among Europeans, particularly the inhabitants of southern Europe, but it would be a mistake to assume that less feeling existed. Mallery, who devoted much attention to this subject, says:

"The North American Indians do not have many conventional forms of salutation. Their etiquette generally is to meet in silence and smoke before speaking, the smoking being the real salutation. But a number of tribes—e. g., the Shoshoni, Caddo, and Arikara—use a word or sound very similar to How! but in proper literature Hau or Hao. Most of the Sioux use the same sound in communication with the whites, from which the error has arisen that they have caught up and abbreviated the 'How are you?' of the latter. But the word is ancient, used in councils, and means 'good,' or 'satisfactory.' It is a response as well as an address or salutation. The Navaho say, both at meeting and parting, 'Agalani,' an archaic word the etymology of which is not yet ascertained. Among the Cherokee the colloquy is as follows: No. 1 says, 'Siyú' [properly Ásiyu], 'good'; No. 2 responds, 'Ásiyú; td-higwatsú?' 'good; are you in peace?' To this No. 1 says, 'I am in peace, and how is it with you?' No. 2 ends by 'I am in peace also.' Among the Zúñi happiness is always asserted as well as implored. In the morning their greeting is, 'How have you passed the night?' in the evening, 'How have you come unto the sunset?' The reply always is 'Happily.' After a separation of even short duration, if more than one day, the question is asked, 'How have you passed these many days?' The reply is invariably, 'Happily,' although the person addressed may be in severe suffering or dying."

The greeting Hao! or some variant was found over a much wider area than Mallery indicates. What Mallery says of smoking applies only to ceremonial visitings. The ordinary passing greeting among the Plains tribes and probably most others is "Good" in the various languages (Mooney).

Close relations or very dear friends on meeting after a considerable absence would throw their right arms over each other's left shoulders and their left arms under each other's right arms, embrace gently and allow their heads to rest against each other for an instant. The ceremonial form of salutation consisted principally in rubbing with the hands, and is thus described by Iberville as practised on the lower Mississippi: "When I arrived where my brother was, the chief or captain of the Bayogoulas came to the shore of the sea to show me friendship and civility after their manner, which is, being near you, to stop, pass the hands over their face and breast, and afterward pass their hands over yours, after which they raise them toward the sky, rubbing them and clasping them together" (Margry, Déc., iv, 154-55, 1880). Although varying to a certain extent, substantially the same ceremony is reported from the Indians of Carolina and the plains, the Delawares, the Iroquois, the Aleut, and the Eskimo proper; it was therefore widespread throughout North America. Rubbing of noses by two persons is referred to by early writers, and an old Haida Indian affirmed it to have been the ancient custom among his people, but well authenticated cases are rare, although the rubbing of the nose with the hand was often observed among Eskimo tribes. Mooney says that most of these instances, as in the case of the Comanche, may have been nothing more than misconceptions of the hugging described above. Not infrequently the rubbing ceremonies were accompanied by the shedding of tears. Friederici finds two areas in America in which this prevailed, one in the central and south-central part of South America among the Tupi tribes of São Paulo, Minas Geraes, and Bahia, the Charrua of Banda Oriental, and some of the Chaco tribes; the second in North America w. of the Mississippi from the sources of that river to the Texas coast. This was particularly conspicuous near the Gulf of Mexico, from which circumstance the tribes there were often called "weepers." Mooney states that he has noted the custom only where persons meet after a considerable absence, and it was explained to him as due to memories of events, particularly deaths, which had taken place since the previous meeting and which the figure of the long absent one calls to mind. In some cases, however, this has been observed on the first meeting of Indians with white men, when it perhaps had some religious significance.

Samoset (possibly from Osamoset, 'he who walks over much.'—Gerard). A native and sagamore of Pemaquid, and the original proprietor of the site of Bristol, Me. It is stated that he appeared among the Pilgrims soon after their landing in 1620 and greeted them with the words "Welcome, Englishmen!"—showing that he was more or less acquainted with their language—and informed them that he was a sagamore of Moratiggon (q. v.). As he had been in the C. Cod country for 8 months, it is probable that he went thither with Capt. Dermer, who left Monhegan for C. Cod a few months previous to the date mentioned. Samoset introduced the Pilgrims to Massasoit (q. v.), with whom it seems he was in friendly relation at that time. Moved to pity by his apparent destitution, the Pilgrims gave him "a horseman's coat" and also "strong water and biskit and butter, and cheese and pudding, and a piece of a mallard." Samoset repaid this kindness by the services he rendered the new colonists. He is next heard of two years later at Capmanwogen (Southport, Me.), with Capt. Levett, whom he esteemed as his special friend. In July, 1625, he, with Unongoit, executed the first deed made between the Indians and the English, conveying to John Brown, of New Harbor, 12,000 acres of the Pemaquid territory. Nothing further is recorded of Samoset until 1653, when he signed a deed conveying 1,000 acres to William Parnell, Thomas Way, and William England. He probably died soon thereafter, and was buried with his kindred on his island homestead near Round pond, in the town of Bristol. He is described as having been tall and straight, with hair long behind and short in front; his only dress "a leather" about his waist with a fringe about a span long. Mention is made of one son born to him about 1624, but his name is not given. Consult Mourt in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., viii, 226, 1802; Thornton in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 167-201, 1857; Sewell in Mag. Am. Hist., viii, 820-25, 1882. (C. T.)

Samp. A maize porridge, once a very important article of food in New England and elsewhere. In 1677 the treasurer of Massachusetts was ordered to procure, among other things to be given as presents to the king, "two hogsheds of special good sampe." Roger Williams (Key to Am. Lang., 33, 1643) defines the nasump of the Narraganset dialect of Algonquian as "a kind of meale pottage unparched," adding that "from this the English call their samp, which is Indian corn beaten and boiled, and eaten hot or cold with milke or butter." Josselyn (1672) describes sampe as "a kind of loblolly of blue corn to eat with milk." The Narraganset nasump, "softened with water," is cognate with the Abnaki taphtun, corn mush, etc. (A. F. C.)

Sampala. A former Seminole town, 26 m. above the forks of Apalachicola r., on the w. bank, in Calhoun co., Fla.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Sampanal. A tribe, evidently of the Coahuiltecan family, met by Massanet's party in 1689, when on the way from Coahuila to Texas, at Sacatsol mts., 20 leagues s. of the Rio Grande, in Texas. They were with the Mescal, Yoric, Chomene, Jumano, Tilpayay, and other tribes. Massanet, Carta, etc. 1690, in Quar. Tex. Hist. Assn., ii, 284, 1890. In 1691 Massanet met the same tribe near Rio Hondo. Diario, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 94, MS.). (B. E. B.)

Sampe. See Samp.

Sana. A central Texas tribe, apparently Tonkawan. It was known as early as 1691, when Massanet mentioned it in one of the most important passages bearing on the ethnology of early Texas. When about 25 m. N. E. of San Antonio r., apparently at Arroyo del Cibolo, and about opposite Seguin, he wrote: "I may note that from the mission [San Salvador, in Coahuila] to this place there is still one language [the Coahuiltecan] . . . From this place to the Texas there are other languages. There follow the Catqueca, Cantona, Emet, Cavas, Sana, Tojo, Toaa, and other tribes of Indians. At the said place, it being on the boundary between the Indians, they speak different languages, although they are all friendly and do not have wars." The Coahuiltecan tribes called the place Xoloton, and the tribes to the E. called it Bata Coniquiyoqui (Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 98, MS.).

In 1716 the Chanas, evidently identical, are mentioned by Ramón, together with Apaches, Yojuanes, and Chuuipanes, as enemies of the Texas (Orig. MS. in Archivo Gen. de Mex.). An imperfect copy of Ramón's report give "Jumanes" and "Chivipanes" in place of Yojuanes and Chuuipanes (Representación, Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 160, MS.). In 1716 the same list is given as the Apaches, Yojuanes, Cibipanes, and Canas (Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, ibid., 193), and a few days later as Apaches, Jojuanes, Huvipanes (Ervipiames), and Chanas (Junta de Guerra, Dec. 2, 1716, ibid., 217). If the last list be correct, it is one of several indications of the Tonkawan affiliation of the Sana. Shortly after this period Llano r. was known as Rio de los Chanes, but it is not known that there is any connection between this and the name of the Sana tribe.

In 1721 the Sana are again met and dealt with. Late in January, it seems, some of the tribe (Samas) came from the E. to San Antonio and reported to Capt. García that Saint Denis, the French commandant at Natchitoches, had called a meeting of many tribes 30 leagues from San Antonio (Peña, Diario, Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 6, MS.). When Aguayo passed through San Antonio he made the Sana presents. Later he met part of the tribe, apparently in their home, halfway between the Guadalupe and the Colorado, in the neighborhood of modern San Marcos (ibid., 18).

Late in 1739 or early in 1740 a severe epidemic visited the San Antonio missions, and in Feb., 1740, the missionaries, wishing to replenish the supply of Indians, declared their intention of bringing in "the Zanas and Mayeyes, since they are related to those already converted" (ibid., xxviii, 203). As Massanet distinctly tells us that the Sana did not speak the Coahuiltecan language, and as the Mayeyes were quite evidently Tonkawan, the conclusion is that the Sana also were Tonkawan. A considerable list of words spoken by the Sana and their congeners is extant, and a careful study of it will perhaps settle the point (San Antonio de Valero Bautismos, beginning with 1740, MS.). In 1740 gentile Sana began to enter San Antonio de Valero mission in considerable numbers, and continued coming till about 1749. A study of the records shows that before entering the mission they were very closely interrelated by marriage with the Tojo (Tou, Too), Maveye, Sijame, Tenu, and Aujuiap tribes or subtribes. In 1743, "Numa, of the Tou tribe, chief of the Zanas," was baptized at the mission (San Antonio de Valero Bautismos, partidas 494, 549, 579, 581, 608, 633, 635, 647, 675, 714, etc.). In 1793 the Sana were mentioned as one of the main tribes at San Antonio de Valero (Revilla-Gigedo, Carta, 195, in Dic. Univ. de Hist. y de Geog., v, 1854).

The native pronunciation of the name was perhaps Chanas, but the most frequent spelling in the mission records is Zanas. Cf. Sanukh. (H. E. B.)

San Agustin de Ahumada. A Spanish presidio established in 1756 near the mouth of Trinity r., Texas, to prevent the French from trading and settling among the Arkokisa and Bidai Indians, who lived along the lower courses of that stream and the Rio San Jacinto. Its establishment was the direct result of the arrest in 1754 (not 1757, as Morfi says) of one Blancpain (or Lanpen), who was trading in that vicinity among the Arkokisa. Bancroft gives the date of the founding as 1755, but an official report says that it was effected in consequence of an order of Feb. 12, 1756. It is true, however, that a temporary garrison was considered in 1755. Bancroft also fixes the first site about 100 m. up the Trinity, but official documents show that it was only about 2 leagues' distance from the mouth. Near it was established, at about the same time, Nuestra Señora de la Luz, or Orcoquisac (Arkokisa), mission.

Because of the unhealthfulness of the site, a plan to remove the presidio to the arroyo of Santa Rosa de Alcazar, a branch of the Rio San Jacinto, in the center of the Arkokisa country, was soon proposed; in 1757 the Viceroy ordered the plan carried out; and, according to an official statement, it was accomplished before Aug., 1760, but this seems to be an error. Later, apparently in 1764, the presidio was ordered moved to Los Horconsitos, 2 or 3 leagues N. of the original site, but it appears that the removal was never made. A few years afterward the presidio was burned as the result of a quarrel, and in 1772 its abandonment was ordered, although this, as well as that of the mission, had already taken place (see Lamar Papers, Span. MS. no. 25; Nacogdoches Archives, Span. San Andrés Coata. A former Pima rancharia, visited and so named by Father Kino in 1697, and probably as early as 1694 (Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 259, 1884); situated near the junction of the Gila and Salado, s. Ariz. Taylor (Cal. Farmer, June 13, 1862) mentions it as a mission founded by Kino in 1694, but this is evidently an error.

San Andrés.—Garcés (1775), Diary, 142, 1900. San Andrés Coata.—Mange in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., i, 306, 1856.

San Angelo. A rancharia of the Sobai-puri, near the w. bank of Rio Santa Cruz, below its mouth in s. Arizona, first visited and doubtless so named by Father Kino in the latter part of the 17th century.

S. Angel.—Kino, map (1701), in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 360, 1889. S. Angelo.—Kino, map (1702), in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott., 74, 1726.

San Antonio (Saint Anthony). A former pueblo of the Tigua, situated E. of the present settlement of the same name, about the center of the Sierra de Gallego, or Sierra de Carnué, between San Pedro and Chiliti, E. of the Rio Grande, N. Mex. According to Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 253, 1892), the only mention of the settlement is made in the Carnué land grant in the 18th century, and it must have been occupied within historic times.

San Antonio. A former group of Alchedoma rancherias, situated on the Rio Colorado in Arizona, 35 or 40 m. below the mouth of Bill Williams fork. Visited and so named by Fray Francisco Garcés in 1776.—Garcés, Diary, 423, 1900.

San Antonio. A Tepehuane pueblo, and formerly the seat of a Spanish mission, at the N. boundary of Durango, Mexico, lon. 105°.

S. Antonio.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 319, 1864.

San Antonio de la Huerta. A pueblo of the Nevome, situated at the junction of the Rio Batepito and Rio Soyopa, tributaries of the Rio Yaqui, about lat. 29°, lon. 109°, Sonora, Mexico (Orozco y Berra, Geog., 351, 1864). It is now a civilized pueblo, and contained 171 inhabitants in 1900.

San Antonio de Padua. The third Franciscan mission established in California. The place was chosen by Father Junípero Serra in the well-wooded valley of the stream now known as San Antonio r., about 6 m. from the present town of Jolon, Monterey co. The native name of the place was Texhaya, or Teshaya. Here the mission was founded by Serra with great enthusiasm on July 14, 1771, though only one native was present. The Indians, however, proved friendly; they brought food and helped in the work of constructing the church and other necessary buildings. The first native was baptized a month later, and by the end of 1772, 158 baptisms were reported. In 1780 the neophytes numbered 585, while by 1790 they had reached 1,076, making it the largest mission community at that time in California. By 1800 there was a slight increase to 1,118, while the greatest number in the history of the mission, 1,124, was reached in 1805. The wealth of the mission was not so great as that of some others. The land was reported as rather sterile and difficult to irrigate, although the average crop for the decade ending 1810 was 3,780 bushels. In the year last named there were 3,700 cattle, 700 horses, and more than 8,000 sheep. Though the number of the neophytes gradually decreased, reaching 878 in 1820 and 681 in 1830, the mission live stock continued to multiply and the crops were nearly as good as before. In 1830 Robinson (Life in California, 81, 1846) reported that everything at the mission was in the most perfect order, and the Indians cleanly and well dressed. Beyond an attack on the mission converts by some outside natives in 1774, in which one Indian only was wounded, there does not seem to have been any trouble with the natives in this region. By 1830 there were said to be no more gentiles within 75 m. Up to 1834 the total number of Indians baptized was 4,348, of whom 2,587 were children. The earlier buildings of the mission were of adobe, but a new and larger church with arched corridors and a brick front was begun about 1809, and completed within the next ten years. The mission was formally secularized in 1835, and during the next few years declined rapidly, losing a large part of its stock. There was much friction between Padre Mercado and the civil administrator, and many of the Indians deserted because of bad treatment. As with the other missions, the control was restored to the padres in 1843, but too late to accomplish much good. There seems to be no record of the sale of the mission. Padre Doroteo Ambris remained there for several years, and at his death the mission was deserted, except for an occasional service by a visiting priest from San Miguel. The place remained in ruins until 1904, when the Landmarks Club of California undertook its preservation. The Indians in the neighborhood of the San Antonio mission belonged to the Salinan linguistic stock, but the mission also had neophytes from the San Joaquin valley, probably Yokuts. The following names of villages have been taken from the old mission books (Taylor, Cal. Farmer, Apr. 27, 1860): Atnel, Chacomex, Chitama, Cholucyte, Chunapatama, Chuquilin (San Miguelita), Chuzach, Cinnisel, Ejmal, Ginace, Iolon, Lamaca, Lima, Quina (Quinada), Sapaywis, Seama, Steloglamo, Subazama, Tecolom, Teshaya, Tetachoya (Ojitos), Texja, Tsilacomap, Zasaalete, Zumbrito. The rancherias, it is said, were generally named after their chiefs. (A. B. L.)

San Antonio de Valero. A mission, commonly known as the The Alamo (Ah'-lah-mo), transplanted in 1718 from the Rio Grande to the site of the present city of San Antonio, Texas. It, together with the adjacent presidio and villa, was founded as an intermediate center of operations between the Rio Grande and the E. Texas missions, which had been reestablished in 1716. The missionary part of the enterprise was planned and directed by Fray Antonio de San Buenaventura de Olivares. In 1700 he had founded San Francisco Solano mission near the Rio Grande, in Valle de la Circuncisión (Portillo, Apuntes para la Historia Antigua de Coahuila y Texas, 269-70, 1888). It was subsequently moved to San Ildefonso, thence to San Joseph, on the Rio Grande, a short distance from Presidio del Rio Grande (Valero Bautismos, folio 1). The principal tribe baptized at these places was the Xarame, although the Siaguan, Payuguan, Papanac, and perhaps others were represented. By 1716, 364 baptisms had been performed (Valero Bautismos). In this year, when the government was planning a settlement between the Rio Grande and E. Texas, Olivares proposed transplanting this mission, with its Indians, to the river then called San Antonio de Padua, maintaining that his Xarames, since they were well versed in agriculture, would assist in teaching and subduing new neophytes (Olivares to the Viceroy, Mem. de Nueva España, 169-70, MS.). This plan was carried out in 1718, possession of the new site being formally given on May 1. The transfer was no doubt facilitated by the close affinity of the tribes at the new site with those at the old. The mission was founded near the E. frontier of the Coahuiltecan group. The tribes or bands near by were extremely numerous and in general correspondingly small. One of the chief ones was the Payaya.

This was not the first time they had heard the gospel, for in 1691 Massanet had entered their village on San Antonio r. (which they had called Yanaguana), set up a cross, erected an altar in a chapel of boughs, said mass in the presence of the natives, explained its meaning, and distributed rosaries, besides giving the Payaya chief a horse. This tribe, Massanet said, was large, and their rancherías deserved the name of pueblo (Diario, Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 95-96, MS.).

Within about a year the mission, now called San Antonio de Valero, was removed across the river, evidently to the site it still occupies (Espínosa, Crónica Apostólica, 450, 1746). From the records it seems that only one baptism was performed in 1718. In 1719 there were 24, mainly of Xarames and Payayas, but representing also the Cluetau, Junced (Juncal?), Pamaya, Siaguan, Sijame, Sumi, and Terocodame tribes. The first decade resulted in about 250 baptisms, representing some 40 so-called tribes. By Feb. 1740, there had been 837 baptisms. Shortly before this an epidemic had gone through all the San Antonio missions, and left at Valero only 184 neophytes; but immediately afterward (1739-40) 77 Tacamanes (Tacames?) were brought in (Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 203-04, MS.). A report made Dec. 17, 1741, showed 238 persons resident at the mission (Urrutia to the Viceroy, MS.). On May 8, 1744, the first stone of a new church was laid, but in 1762 it was being rebuilt, a work that seems never to have been completed (Diego Martín García, 1745, op. cit., and Informe de Misiones, 1762, Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 164, MS.). According to a report made in 1762, the books showed 1,972 baptisms (evidently an exaggeration), 247 burials, and 454 marriages. There were then 275 persons, of the Xarames, Payaya, Sana, Lipan (captives mainly), Coco, Tojo (Tou), and Karaukawa tribes. Of this number 32 were gentiles of the last-named tribe, whose reduction was then being attempted, notwithstanding the opposition of the Zacatecan missions (see Nuestra Señora del Rosario).

The same report, besides describing the monastery workshops, church, chapel, and ranch, says of the Indian quarters: "There are 7 rows of houses for the dwellings of the Indians; they are made of stone and supplied with doors and windows; they are furnished with high beds, chests, metates, pots, flat earthen pans, kettles, cauldrons, and boilers. With their arched porticoes the houses form a broad and beautiful plaza through which runs a canal skirted by willows and fruit trees, and used by the Indians. To insure a supply of water in case of blockade by the enemy a curbed well has been made. For the defense of the settlement, the plaza is surrounded by a wall. Over the gate is a large tower with its embrasures, 3 cannons, some firearms, and appropriate supplies (Trans. by E. Z. Rather, in Bolton and Barker, With the Makers of Texas, 64-65, 1904). For a description of the massive walls, see Bancroft, No. Mex. States, II, 207-08, 1889.

After 1765 the activity of this mission suddenly declined, even more rapidly than that of the neighboring missions. This decline was contemporaneous, on the one hand, with the lessening of political activity in Texas after the acquisition of Louisiana by the Spaniards, and, on the other hand, with a growing hostility on the part of the northern tribes. It seems also true that the docile tribes on which the mission had largely depended were becoming exhausted. Moreover the growing villa of San Fernando encroached upon the mission lands and injurious quarrels resulted. From 1764 to 1783 only 102 baptisms were recorded for Valero, while a number of these were of Spaniards. In 1775 Inspector Oconor reported fewer than 15 families there (quoted by Portillo, op. cit., 297-98). In 1793 there were still 43 Payaya, Sana, and others, evidently survivors of families brought there long before (Revilla Gígedo, Carta, Dec. 27, 1793, MS.).

In 1793 this mission was secularized, and the lands were divided among the neophytes and some of the citizens (not Indians) who had abandoned Adaes in 1773. The walled inclosure and the buildings were later occupied by the company del Alamo de Parras, whence the name Alamo (Revilla-Gígedo, op. cit.; Portillo, op. cit., 353-54), and in 1836 they became the scene of one of the most heroic events in all history—the famed resistance and annihilation of Travis and his men, Mar. 6, 1836. The chapel is now the property of the State of Texas.

The baptismal records show the surprising number of about 100 apparently distinct tribes or subtribes represented at this mission during its whole career after the removal to the San Antonio. These are: Apache, Apion, Caguas, Camai, Cantuna (Cantanual), Cems (Quems?), Chaguan-tapam, Chapamaco, Chuapas, Cimataguo, Cluetau, Coco, Cocomeioje (Coco), Colorado, Comanche, Cupdan, Emet, Gabilan, Guerjuatida, Huacacasa, Hyerbipiamo, Jancae (Tonkawa?), Juamaca (Juampa?), Juancas, Jueinzum, Juncatas (Juncataguo), Junced, Karankawa, Lipan, Macocoma (Cocoma), Manos Coloradas, Manos Prietas, Maquems, Matucar, Mayeye, Menequen, Merhuan, Mescales, Mesquites, Mulato, Muruam, Natao, Necpacha (Apache?), Nigro, Ocana, Pachaquen (cf. Pacuaches), Pachaug, Paguanan, Pamaya, Papanac (Panae), Paquache, Pasqual, Pastaloca, Pataguo, Patan, Patanium, Patou, Patzan, Pausaqui, Pansay, Payaya, Pavuguan (Payuhuan), Peana, Piniqui, Pita, Psapsau, Quesal, Quimso (Quems?), Secmoco, Sencase, Siaban, Siaguan, Siaguasan, Siansi, Sijame, Sinicu, Siniczo (Senisos, Cenizos), Sulujame, Sumi, Tacames (Tacamane), Tenu, Terocodame, Tetzino, Texa (Hainai?), Tiemamar, Tishim, Tonkawa, Tonzaumacagua, Tucana, Tuu, Ujuiaip (Ajuiaip), Uracha, Xarame, Xaraname (Araname), Yaclossa, Yman, Yojuan, Yorica, Yuta (Yute), Zorquan. (H. E. B.)

San Antonio de Valero.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 618, 1886 (misprint).

Sanate Adiva (said to mean 'great woman,' or 'chief woman'). A priestess or chieftainess at the Nabadache village on San Pedro cr., Houston co., Texas, in 1768. See Nabadache.

San Athanasio (Saint Athanasius). A Cochimi pueblo and visita 5 leagues from San Ignacio de Kadakaman mission, Lower California, in 1745.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., II, 198, 1759.

San Benito (Saint Benedict). A former Serrano village of 80 inhabitants near the source of the Rio Mohave, 3 leagues N. E. over the mountains from San Bernardino valley. It was visited and so named by Fray Francisco Garcés in 1776.—Garcés, Diary (1776), 246, 1900.

San Bernabé (Saint Barnabas). A former Tepehuane pueblo of Durango, Mexico, and the seat of a mission.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 319, 1864.

San Bernardino (Saint Bernardinus). The name of "an island that the [Gila] river makes temporarily when it rises," where there are some Maricopa rancherias. The place was visited by Anza, Font, and Garcés in 1774-75. Not to be confounded with a Maricopa rancheria of the same name on the Gila, 4 leagues above. See Coues, Garcés Diary, 119, 126, 1900.

San Bernardino. A former Maricopa rancheria at Agua Caliente, or the hot springs, near the Rio Gila, s. Ariz., about 24 leagues above its mouth. It was visited by Anza in 1774, and by Garcés, Anza, and Font in 1775.

Agua Caliente.—Anza and Font (1780) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 392, 1889. San Bernardino del Agua Caliente. Font (1775) quoted in Coues, Garcés Diary, 120, 1900.

San Bernardo (Saint Bernard). A name applied by Mezières in 1778 to one of two Tawehash villages visited by him on upper Red r., Texas. See Mezières, letter to Croix, Apr. 19, 1778 (in which he reports having given the village this name in honor of the Governor of Louisiana), MS. in Archivo Gen. Mex. (H. E. B.)

San Bonifacio (Saint Boniface). Apparently a former rancheria of one of the Piman tribes, probably Papago, situated s. of the Rio Gila between San Angelo and San Francisco, in the present Arizona, at the beginning of the 18th century.

S. Bonifacius.—Kino, map (1702), in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott. 74, 1726.

San Buenaventura. The ninth Franciscan mission founded in California, and the last by Father Junípero Serra. The site was chosen within the limits of the present Ventura, Ventura co., near the beach and adjoining one of the native villages, and the usual founding ceremonies took place Mar. 31, 1782. The natives seemed pleased with the prospect and readily aided in the construction of the new buildings. The increase in the number of neophytes was not so rapid as at some of the missions. In 1790 there were 385; in 1800, 715; in 1810, 1,297; while the highest number, 1,328, was reached in 1816. In other respects the mission was very successful; it had more cattle (10,013 head) and raised more grain (9,400 bushels) in 1800 than any other place in California. Vancouver visited the mission in Nov. 1793, and remarked on the quantity, variety, and general excellence of its vegetables and fruits. The buildings also were excellent, though the new stone church was not completed and dedicated until 1809. During the first decade of the 19th century the mission continued the most prosperous in California. In 1810 there were 21,221 cattle, 3,276 horses and mules, and 8,543 small stock, with an average crop for the decade of 6,400 bushels. Though losing somewhat by 1820, the mission still retained first place. The earthquake of 1812, which destroyed the church at San Juan Capistrano, also severely injured the new church of San Buenaventura, and it was feared that the whole mission site was settling into the sea, so that all the inhabitants removed to higher ground for three months. After 1820 the mission declined rapidly, both in converts and in material prosperity. In 1830 there were 726 neophytes, and 626 in 1834. Up to that time the total number of natives baptized was 3,805, of whom 1,909 were children. Secularization does not seem to have been carried out here until 1837. Bancroft estimates that in 1840 there were about 250 Indians in the community and as many more scattered in the district. In 1844 the mission was reported as still fairly prosperous; in 1846 the lands were sold for $12,000. The buildings remained in the possession of the Catholic Church, and since 1843 the mission has been the regular parish church of Ventura, which in garbled form was named from the mission. In 1893 the old church was so renovated as to lose much of its historic interest. The Indians among whom San Buenaventura mission was established belonged to the Chumashan (q. v.) linguistic family, which probably furnished the major portion of the neophytes. (A. B. L.)

San Carlos (Saint Charles). The second Franciscan mission founded in California. Even before the founding of San Diego an expedition started N. under Portolá, in 1769, to explore the country and find the port of Monterey, previously described by Vizcaino (1602), where it was intended to establish the next mission. They reached the port, but did not recognize it, and returned, after setting up a cross on the shore of the bay. The following spring two expeditions started, one by land and one by sea. Both expeditions arrived safely, and the port was this time recognized beyond a doubt. The cross was found still standing, but surrounded and adorned with arrows, sticks, feathers, fish, meat, and clams, placed there by the natives, apparently as offerings. The bells were hung and the Mission of San Carlos Borromeo de Monterey was formally founded June 3, 1770. Some huts were built and a palisade erected, but for several days no natives appeared. Father Junípero Serra soon became dissatisfied with the site of the mission, and in December, after the necessary buildings had been constructed, it was removed to Carmelo valley. The mission was henceforth known as San Carlos Borromeo del Carmelo, sometimes in later days merely as Carmelo. The old site became the presidio of Monterey. The native name of the new site, according to Taylor (Cal. Farmer, Feb. 22, 1860) was Eslenes. The number of converts gradually increased, 165 being reported in 1772, and 614 in 1783. Serra made San Carlos his headquarters, and here he died, Aug. 24, 1784, and was buried in the mission church. In 1785 Lasuen was chosen padre presidente, and made his residence chiefly at San Carlos, Palou having temporarily taken charge after Serra's death. Monterey being an important port, San Carlos was visited by a number of travelers, including La Perouse (1786) and Vancouver (1793). The mission never had a large number of neophytes; the highest, 927, was reached in 1794, after which there was a gradual decline. In livestock and agriculture the mission was fairly successful, the average crop for the decade ending 1800 being 3,700 bushels. Cattle and horses in 1800 numbered 2,180, and sheep more than 4,000. There was considerable increase during the next decade, but before 1820 the decline had begun, though it was less marked for a time than at many other missions. In 1797 a new stone church, the ruins of which are still to be seen, was completed. The number of neophytes was 758 in 1800, 513 in 1810, 381 in 1820, and about 150 in 1834. There was but little of the mission property left at the time of secularization in the year last named, while by 1840 the ruined buildings were all that remained. The mission church was entirely neglected until about 1880, when it was restored and roofed, and was rededicated in Aug. 1884. The neophytes of San Carlos belonged chiefly to the Costanoan and Esselenian linguistic stocks. Representatives of most of the Esselen villages were doubtless included, as well as of the Rumsen, Kalindaruk, and Sakhone divisions of the Costanoan, some of the Chalmes, with probably also some of the Mutsun. The following names of villages are given by Taylor (Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860), most of them being taken from the mission books: Achasta, Alcoz, Animpayamo, Aspasniagan, Cakanaruk, Capanay (Kapanai), Carmentaruka, Chachat, Coyyo, Culul (Kulul), Ecceagam, Echilat, Eslanagan, Excellenaks, Fyules, Gilimis, Guayusta, Ichenta, Jappayon, Lucayasta, Mustac, Nennequi, Noptac, Nutnur, Nuthesum (Mutsun), Pachhepes, Paisin, Pytoguis (Poitokwis), Santa Clara (Eselenes proper), Saponnet, Sargentarukas, Soccorondo, Tebityilat, Tinbta, Triwta, Tucutnut (or Santa Teresa), Tushguesta, Wachanaruka, Xaseum, Xumis, Yampas, Yanostas, Ymunacam. San Cristóbal (Saint Christopher). Once the principal pueblo of the Tano (q. v.), situated between Galisteo and Pecos, Santa Fé co., N. Mex. The natives of this pueblo and of San Lazaro were forced by hostilities of the Apache, the eastern Keresan tribes, and the Pecos to transfer their pueblos to the vicinity of San Juan, where the towns were rebuilt under the same names (Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 186, 1889). This removal (which was more strictly to a place called Pueblito, near the present Potrero, about 2 m. E. of Santa Cruz, on the Rio Santa Cruz), occurred after the Pueblo revolt of 1680, and prior to 1692, at which latter date the natives were found by Vargas in their new locality. The pueblo was abandoned in 1694, but was later reoccupied, and was finally deserted in 1696 after the murder of their missionary in June of that year. Most of their descendants are now among the Hopi of Arizona. See Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 83, 103, 1892; Meline, Two Thousand Miles, 220, 1867.

warmer isotherms, but often being carried by migration and retained through tribal custom in regions where extremes of temperature prevailed. In both hemispheres the sandal formed a part of the costume of the peoples more advanced in culture; it was the characteristic footwear of the Peruvians, Central Americans, Mexicans, and Pueblos, and especially of Indians living in the cactus region generally. In its simplest form the Pueblo sandal consisted of a sole braided from tenacious leaves, held to the foot by a toe and heel cord, or by a cord roved through loops on the margin of the sole and passing over the foot. Other sandals have flaps at the toe and heel, and in some cases the entire foot is covered, when the sandal becomes a sort of rude moccasin. Sandals occur in considerable variety, designed for men, women, and children, and for different seasons. The material is almost exclusively derived from the yucca plant—either the plain leaves, hanks of the extracted fiber, or cord of various sizes twisted from the fiber. Sandals consisting of a half-inch pad of yucca fibers, held to the foot with strips of the same material or by thongs, are said to be worn by Kawia men at night. Putnam found sandals in Mammoth Cave, Ky., thus determining their former use in E. United States. A few tribes of California, the Ute of the interior basin, the Mohave, the Pima, and perhaps the tribes around the Gulf of Mexico, wore sandals. Within recent years the older people among the Pima have commonly worn sandals of undressed hide, especially when traveling, to protect the feet from cactus spines. A similar sandal is worn by the Chemehuevi. Among some of the ancient Pueblos a sandal was buried with the body of an infant to "guide" the deceased to the sipapu or entrance to the underworld. See Clothing, Moccasin.

Sandia (Span.: 'watermelon'). A Tigua pueblo on the E. bank of the Rio Grande, N. Mex., 12 m. N. of Albuquerque. It evidently formed one of the pueblos of the Province of Tiguex of the chroniclers of Coronado's expedition in 1540-42; and is the Napeya (a corruption of Nafiat, the native name of the pueblo) of Juan de Oñate in 1598. Sandia became the seat of the Franciscan mission of San Francisco early in the 17th century, but it was abandoned during the Pueblo revolt of 1680, most of the inhabitants fleeing for safety to the Hopi country in N. E. Arizona, where, probably with other refugees, they built the village of Payupki, on the Middle mesa, the walls of which are still partly standing. Payupki is the name by which the Sandia pueblo is still known to the Hopi. In 1681 Gov. Otermin, during his attempt to reconquer New Mexico, burned Sandia. The people remained among the Hopi until 1742, when Fathers Delgado and Pino brought 441 of them and their children to the Rio Grande; but it would seem that some of these returned to Arizona, since Father Juan Miguel Menchero, in a petition to the governor in 1748, stated that for six years he had been engaged in missionary work among the Indians, and had "converted and gained more than 350 souls from here to the Puerco r., which I have brought from the Moqui pueblos—bringing with me the cacique of these Moqui pueblos, for the purpose of establishing their pueblo at the place called Sandia," and thereupon asked for possession of the land at that point "so as to prevent my converts from returning to apostacy." The governor made the desired grant (which now consists of 24,187 acres, confirmed by Congress), and the new pueblo was established in due form under the name Nuestra Señora de los Dolores y San Antonio de Sandia (see Meline, Two Thousand Miles, 214, 1867; Prince, New Mexico, 38, 1883). The population of Sandia was 78 in 1910. See Pueblos, Tigua. (F. W. H.)

San Diego (Saint James). The first mission established within the present state of California. After the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767, the Spanish authorities determined to found a number of military and missionary establishments in California. The mission work was placed in the hands of the Franciscans, and Father Junípero Serra, who was already president of the missions of Lower California, took charge. Two vessels and two land expeditions were dispatched northward from the settlements in Lower California, and reached the harbor of San Diego, named and described in 1602 by Vizcaino, in the early summer of 1769. Serra arrived with the last land division on July 1, and on July 16 he formally founded the mission, dedicating it to San Diego de Alcalá. The place chosen was at the present Old Town, on a hill near the bay, at or near the native village of Cosoy. The natives were by no means timid; indeed they soon became so bold in their thievish operations that they made a concerted attempt to plunder the settlement. In the conflict which followed, Aug. 15, 1769, one Spaniard and a number of Indians were killed. After this a stockade was built around the mission, and the natives became more respectful. The missionary work was at first without success, and it was a year or more before the first neophyte was enrolled, while for several years the work progressed but slowly. During the first few years the mission also suffered much from lack of supplies, and at one time was on the point of being abandoned when the supplies arrived. Owing to lack of knowledge of local conditions the crops of the first two or three years were not successful. In 1774 the mission was moved N. E. up the valley about 6 m. to a place called by the natives Nipaguav, while the old site at Cosoy became the presidio. At the new locality various buildings were erected, including a wooden church, 18 X 57 ft, with roof of tules. At the end of this year there were 97 neophytes; the crops had been fairly successful and the livestock were increasing. During the summer of 1775 the prospects seemed bright: on one day 60 new converts were baptized; but a little later, on the night of Nov. 4, 1775, the mission was attacked by nearly 800 Indians. The total number of persons at the mission was only 11—4 soldiers, the two priests, and 5 others, two of whom were boys. Father Jayme and two of the men were killed, and most of the buildings burned. This uprising seems to have been due largely to two of the recently baptized neophytes, who incited the neighboring rancherias to make the attack. For several years after there were reports of intended hostilities, but aside from an expedition sent against the hostile Indians of Pamó in 1778, there seems to have been no open conflict. Meanwhile the mission building had been rebuilt and the number of neophytes increased rapidly. In 1783

there were 740; in 1790, 856; and in 1800, 1,523, the mission at that time being the most populous in California. In 1797 there were 554 baptisms, the second largest number recorded for a single year at any California mission. Fages reported in 1787 that on account of the sterility of the soil not more than half the neophytes lived at the mission, and indeed it seems that the converts lived more independently than at the other missions, occupying to a large extent their own rancherias. About the year 1800 extensive irrigation works were begun, including a large dam, still in existence, which was constructed about 3½ m. above the mission, though this may not have been finished before 1817 or even later. A new church was built and dedicated Nov. 12, 1813. During the decade ending with 1820 the death rate among the neophytes was 77 per cent of baptisms and 35 per cent of population. The greatest number of neophytes, 1,829, was reached in 1824, while by 1830, the number had decreased to about the same as in 1820. During this decade the mission attained its greatest prosperity and had several ranches and cattle stations in the neighboring valleys. One of the most important was at Santa Isabel, where a chapel was built in 1822 for the 450 neophytes of that place. From the time of its founding to its secularization in 1834, when statistics ceased, the total number of Indians baptized numbered 6,036, of whom 2,685 were children. As the neophytes here had never been so closely attached to the mission as elsewhere, the change due to secularization was not great, the decay of the mission having begun a decade before. The opportunity was given the Indians in 1833 to become independent of the mission and take up lands for themselves, but very few accepted the offer. In Nov. 1834, the native pueblo of San Pascual was reported to contain 34 families. In 1840 there were still about 800 ex-neophytes nominally under the control of mission authorities, though but 50 at the mission proper. The mission building and orchards still remained in charge of the padres till about 1846, when they were sold by Governor Pico. In 1852 the buildings were used as barracks by United States troops. Of the old adobe church but little now remains excepting the façade and some crumbling walls, but steps have been taken by the Landmarks Club of California to prevent further decay. The Indians in the neighborhood of San Diego, from whom the mission drew most of its neophytes, belong to the Yuman linguistic stock, and have been given the collective name Diegueños (q. v.).

San Emidio. A Chumashan division, named after the land grant and present Rancho Emidio, formerly occupying "the country from Buena Vista and Carises lakes and Kern r. to the Sierra Nevada and Coast range," Cal. By treaty of June 10, 1851, these tribes, which had been greatly reduced by smallpox and by conflict with Spaniards and neighboring Indians, reserved a tract between Tejon pass and Kern r., and ceded the remainder of their lands to the United States. The treaty, however, was made inoperative through its rejection by the Senate.

Sanetch. A Salish tribe speaking the Songish dialect and living on Saanich peninsula and the neighboring ids., s. w. Vancouver id. According to Wilson (Jour. Ethnol. Soc. Lond., 238, 1866), they numbered about 600 in 1858; in 1903 the population was 249. There are 5 bands: Mayne Island, Panquerhin, Tsawout, Teartlip, and Trehump. The Saturna Island Indians also belong to the Sanetch.

San Felipe (Saint Philip). A Keresan pueblo on the w. bank of the Rio Grande, about 12 m. above Bernalillo, n. central New Mexico. Before the advent of the Spaniards into New Mexico in the 16th century, the ancestors of the inhabitants of this pueblo and of Cochiti formed a single tribe occupying successively a number of pueblos, the last of which was Kuapa. Owing to the aggressiveness of the Tewa, whose territory formed their northern boundary, these people were forced to separate into two divisions, one, the Cochiti, retiring to the Potrero Viejo, the other branch going farther down the Rio Grande to the site of the present Mexican settlement of Cubero, just w. of that stream, where they built the pueblo of Katishtya. Subsequently, however, this village was abandoned and a new one, bearing the same name, was constructed at the foot of the mesa of Tamita. Here the San Felipe lived when Coronado visited New Mexico in 1540. In 1591 Castaño de Sosa visited the pueblo and probably gave it the saint name by which it is now commonly known; and in 1598 Oñate also visited it, a document bearing on his expedition applying the name "Castixes" (Katishtya) collectively to the pueblos of San Felipe and "Comitre." This, however, is doubtless an error in copying, the latter name being apparently a misprint or corruption of Tamita, the name of the mesa at the foot of which the pueblo of San Felipe stood. It became the seat of a Spanish mission early in the 17th century, and its first church was erected by Fray Cristóbal de Quiriones, who died at the pueblo in 1607 or 1609, and was buried in the church he had founded. San Felipe was also the residence of the Father Custodian in 1636, but not as a permanent seat. The San Felipe Indians took an active part in the Pueblo revolt of 1680, and as there was then no resident priest at their pueblo, they aided in killing the missionaries of Cochiti, Santo Domingo, and San Felipe (the latter residing at the monastery of Santo Domingo), as well as in the massacre of the Spanish colonists in the neighboring haciendas and of some of the members of their own tribe who remained faithful to the Spaniards. In the latter part of 1681 the pueblo was deserted by its inhabitants, who fled with the Cochiteños and others to Potrero Viejo, but returned in 1683 (see Cochiti). Between the latter date and 1692, when Vargas made his appearance in New Mexico, they again retreated with the other tribes to the Potrero, but the San Felipes were induced by the Spaniards to return. When Vargas appeared the following year he found the San Felipe Indians in a new pueblo at the northern end of the summit of the long Black mesa (Pū'nyi Chátya) w. of the present village, which had been built subsequent to 1683. Here a church was erected in 1694, the walls of which are still partly standing. Soon after the beginning of the 18th century, when there was no further necessity of a defensive site, the tribe left its mesa settlement and erected at its base the San Felipe of the present time—the fourth pueblo that has borne the aboriginal name Katishtya. No remains of the old village near the mesa of Tamita are traceable. San Felipe was made a visita of Santo Domingo in 1782. Population, 554 in 1890, 475 in 1905, and 514 in 1910.

Following are the San Felipe clans, those marked * being quite extinct, and those marked † having only one or two survivors in 1895: Yaka (Corn), Dyami (Eagle), Kuuts (Antelope), Haami (Tobacco), Oshach (Sun), Tanyi (Calabash), Hakanyi (Fire), Tsina (Turkey), Huuka (Dove), Showati (Parrot), Peruka (Frog or Toad), Waiushr (Duck), Tsits (Water), Sii Ant), †Isi (a red and white flower), Shrotsona (Coyote), *Tawash (Moon), †Miiter (Hummingbird), †Sisika (Swallow), Yascha (Coral bead), Hapanyi (Oak), Kohai (Bear), *Dyani (Deer), *Ishto (Arrow), *Mina (Salt), *Haatsu (Earth), *Shuwimi (Turquoise), Soshka (Roadrunner), *Schilra (Crow), Mokaich (Mountain-lion).

San Felipe. A former Diegueño rancharia about 70 m. N. E. of San Diego, s. Cal. As the Indians failed to prove title, the land was confirmed to white settlers by court decision, and in 1903, under act of Congress of May 27, 1902, the 40 occupants of San Felipe were removed to a new reservation at Pala. San Felipe. A former pueblo of the Piro, on the Rio Grande, probably near the present San Marcial, Socorro co., N. Mex. Mentioned only in a document of 1582-83 (Doc. Inéd., xv, 83, 90, 1871). Not to be confounded with the Keresan pueblo of the same name farther N. See Qualacú.

Sant Felipe.—16th cent. doc., op. cit.

San Felipe. A former Sobaipuri rancharia at the junction of Santa Cruz and Gila rs., s. Arizona; first visited by Father Kino and doubtless so named by him. Not to be confounded with the San Felipe (see Terrenate) near the headwaters of the Santa Cruz.

San Felipe. A former small pueblo of the Opata on the Rio Sonora, Sonora, Mexico. The settlement is now civilized, but it still retains some pure Opata.—Hrdlička in Am. Anthr., VI, 72, 1904.

San Felipe. A mission village, probably on the lower Georgia coast, which was among those revolting against the Spaniards in 1687.—Barcia, Ensayo, 287, 1723.

San Felix de Valois. Mentioned in the 18th century as the first rancheria of the Quiquima (Quigyuma), traveling southward; apparently situated on the e. bank of the Rio Colorado, between its mouth and the junction of the Gila, probably about the present Arizona-Sonora boundary.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 497, 1884; Coues, Garcés Diary, 177, 1900.

San Fernando (Saint Ferdinand). A Franciscan mission, founded Sept. 8, 1797, in Los Angeles co., Cal. The site chosen is said to have been that of a native rancheria called Pasecna, but the place had already been occupied as a private ranch, with a house which the missionaries appropriated for their dwelling. Bancroft says that the name of the site was Achois Comihavit. The new mission was dedicated by Father Lasuen to San Fernando, Rey de España, the ceremonies being witnessed by a large gathering of natives. On the first day 10 children were baptized. By the close of the year there were 55 neophytes, and 310 in 1800. In 1806 an adobe church with tiled roof was consecrated. The number of neophytes reached 955 in 1810, while the death-rate was lower than at most of the missions. The mission seems to have been somewhat cramped for lands, at least numerous protests were made against the granting of neighboring ranches to private individuals. Nevertheless the mission was prosperous, the average crop for the decade ending 1810 being 5,220 bushels. The greatest number of neophytes, 1,080, was reached in 1819. After this there was a decided decline in both population and prosperity. In 1834 the natives numbered 792. Up to this time there had been baptized 2,784 Indians, of whom 1,367 were children. The effect of secularization was not so disastrous here as at most of the missions, the administrators in charge giving general satisfaction, so that in 1840 there were still 400 Indians in the ex-mission community. In 1843 San Fernando was returned to the control of the padres, but in 1845 was leased to private individuals, and in the following year was sold by Gov. Pico for $1,120. The last resident minister left in 1847. The old mission church was built of adobe and is now in ruins, though the walls are still standing; the monastery has been repaired by the Landmarks Club of California. The Indians in the neighborhood of San Fernando belong to the Shoshonean linguistic stock and have been included under the name Gabrieleños (q. v.), though more distant tribes to the n. e. doubtless furnished many neophytes. The following villages are recorded as having existed in the neighborhood of San Fernando: Kowanga, Mapipinga,

Okowvinjha, Pasceña, Quapa, Sawayanga, Tacuenga, Tuyunga. (A. B. L.)

San Fernando. A former Pima rancheria, 9 leagues e. of the ruins of Casa Grande, near Rio Gila, s. Arizona; visited and so named by Father Kino about 1697.—Bernal (1697) in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 356, 1889.

San Fernando Vellicata. A Franciscan mission founded in 1769 by Padre Junípero Serra in the n. w. interior part of Lower California, lat. 30° (Browne, Pac. Slope, app., 50, 1869; Shea, Cath. Miss., 91, 1855). Vellicata is probably identical with Guiricata (see San Juan de Dios). Its inhabitants are described as peaceful, and, judging from the locality, were Cochimi.

San Fernando Villacata.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Jan. 24, 1862. San Fernando Villacatta.—Browne, op. cit. St. Ferdinand.—Shea, op. cit.

San Francisco (Saint Francis). A Cora pueblo and formerly a visita of the mission of Jesus María; situated on the upper waters of the Rio Jesus María, in the n. part of the territory of Tepic, Mexico. See Orozco y Berra, Geog., 280, 1864; Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., i, 508; ii, map, 1902.

San Francisco. A rancheria near the presidio of La Bahía and the mission of Espíritu Santo de Zúñiga, on the lower Rio San Antonio, Texas, in 1785, at which date it had 17 inhabitants. These Indians were probably of Karankawan affinity. See Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 659, 1886.

San Francisco. A mission station on the lower Rio Grande, between El Paso, Tex., and San Lorenzo, in 1680 (Otermín quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 182, 1889). It probably pertained to the Tigua or the Piro, or to both.

San Francisco Ati (A-ti'). A Pima village, visited by Kino and Mange in 1698; situated w. of the Rio Santa Cruz, in s. Arizona. It was the seat of a mission established in 1756 by Father Pfefferkorn, according to Och (Nachrichten, i, 71, 1809). Not to be confounded with the Papago settlement of Ati (q. v.) farther s., on the Rio Altar, in Sonora.

Ati.—Arricivita (1771) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 387, 1889. Atison.—Anza and Font (1780), ibid., 392 (doubtless identical; i. e., the "spring" (son or zoni) of Ati). San Francisco Ati.—Mange (1698) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., i, 318, 1856. S. Francisco.—Kino, map (1701), in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 360, 1889. S. Franciscus.—Kino, map (1702), in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott., 74, 1726.

San Francisco Borja. A mission established among the Cochimi by Padre Winceslao Link in 1762; situated in lat. 29°, near the e. coast of Lower California. It was apparently only a visita of San Ignacio (lat. 28°) in 1745, Venegas mentioning it as such in 1759.

San Berja.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., II, 196, 1759. San Francisco Berja.—Taylor in Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app., 50, 1869. S. Berja.—Clavigero, Storia della Cal., II, 146, 1789. S. Francisco Berja.—Taylor, op. cit.

San Francisco de la Espada. A Franciscan mission, founded Mar. 5, 1731, on the abandonment of San Francisco de los Neches (see San Francisco de los Tejas), about 9 m. below San Antonio, Texas, on the w. bank of San Antonio r. Its ruins are now known at San Antonio as "fourth mission." It was at this mission that Fr. Bartolomé García wrote his famous Manual (1760), which preserves for us the Coahuiltecan language. There were brought from the Frio and Nueces rs. (Espinosa conveys a wrong impression when he says they were "in sight") to this and the neighbor missions three docile native tribes, unused to agriculture, the Pacao, Pajalat, and Pitalar, which together were said to number about 1,000 persons. This mission was founded with the Pacao tribe, its chief being made "governor" of the pueblo, called Pueblo de Acuña (Testimonio de Asiento de Misiones, Gen. Land Office, Texas, Span. Archives, XI, folios 13, 21-22). Since most of the records for this mission have disappeared, our knowledge of its tribal history is fragmentary. In June 1737 there were 137 neophytes, mainly Pacaos and Arecabomas (apparently those better known as Tacames), 80 of them having been baptized. These two tribes seem to have been for some time the chief ones there. On June 7 of that year all deserted, the missionaries charging the flight to fear of the Apache, while Indians and soldiers said the cause was bad treatment. By Nov. 22 only 7 had returned, in spite of the fact that three efforts had been made to reclaim them. In January a fourth embassy sent for them brought back 108 more (Lamar Papers, Span. MS. no. 33; Expediente sobre la campaña, Archivo Gen., Prov. Intern., xxxii; Testimony, Aug. 5, 1737, Archivo Gen., Misiones, xxi, MS.). In June 1738 the mission still had a Pacao "governor" (Archivo Gen., Yndiferente de Guerra, 1736-37, folio 93; this volume has recently been transferred to Sección de Historia). This year the Apache made a raid on the neophytes while they were gathering fruit in the neighborhood, near the Medina, killed a number, and took others captive (Expediente sobre la campaña, 6). By Feb. 20, 1740, there had been 233 baptisms at the mission, and at that time, which was immediately after an epidemic, there were 120 neophytes remaining (Descripción, Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 203, MS.). Between 1740 and 1762 the success of the mission was considerable, for by Mar. 6 of the latter year the number of persons baptized had reached 815. Of these 513 had been buried at the mission. These figures are a telling commentary on the death-rate. There were now 52 families, or 207 persons, mainly Pacaos, Borrados, and Maraquites or Maraguitas, the last two of which tribes were still being brought in. A church of stone, begun some time before, was at this time in process of construction. The Indian pueblo consisted of three rows of stone huts. On the ranch there were 1,262 head of cattle, 4,000 sheep and goats, 145 horses, besides burros and working oxen (Informe de Misiones, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 172-78, MS.).

This mission was conducted by the Querétaran fathers up to about 1773, when it was turned over to the Zacatecans. In 1778 Father Morfi wrote in his diary that there were 133 neophytes and 4,000 head of stock, which had much decreased owing to the attack of the Lipan and Comanche. The church, having fallen into ruins, had been razed; apparently it had never been finished. Morfi commented particularly on the excellent lands and irrigating facilities of the mission (Viage de Indios, 1778, in Doc. Hist. Mex., 464-65, 1856). About 1781 Governor Cabello proposed that the buildings of this mission should be destroyed and the neophytes sent to San Antonio de Valero or San José, but this was not done (Revilla-Gigedo, Carta, 1793, 5 223). In 1785 the neophytes numbered 57, and in 1793 only 46. On Apr. 10, 1794, the commandant general of the Provincias Internas, Pedro de Nava, ordered this and the neighbor missions secularized, and the order was in part carried out in June and July by Gov. Manuel Muñoz. On July 11 the movables and lands were distributed among the Indians, each of the 15 adult males being given about 10 acres as private property, and about 100 acres being assigned to the Indians in common (Ynventario de los bienes, etc., in Gen. Land Office, Texas, Span. Archives, L, folios 29-40). It seems, however, that the Zacatecan friars continued their ministry there well into the 19th century. In 1804 there were 39 persons living at the pueblo, and 107 at the mission of San Francisco de la Espada. They were probably not all Indians (census of 1804 in Béxar Archives). (H. E. B.)

San Francisco de los Tejas (or Neches). A Franciscan mission, established in May-June 1690, among the Nabedache tribe, a short distance w. of Neches r., and about 40 m. s. w. of Nacogdoches, Texas. The Nabedache village and the stream near which the mission was founded both became known to the Spaniards as San Pedro. The name of the general locality is still preserved by San Pedro cr. and by the post village of San Pedro N. E. of Crockett, Houston co. A recent personal examination of the country by the writer, in the light of the documents, has fixed the location of the mission at a point from one to two miles N. W. of the present village of Weches. The mission, the first in Texas, was founded by Capt. Alonso de León and Father Damian Massanet, sometimes called Manzanet (Manzanet, letter in Quar. Tex. Hist. Asso., II, 281-312, 1899). The padres founded near by another small establishment called Santísimo Nombre de María, at which Francisco de Jesus María wrote his valuable report on the Hasinai Indians, Aug. 15, 1691. The missionaries worked zealously and succeeded in baptizing the xinesi, or high-priest, of the confederacy, and 80 or more others; but, owing to pestilence, the refusal of the Indians to live in a pueblo of the Spanish sort, their growing hostility, and the excesses of the soldiers, the missions were abandoned, Oct. 25, 1693, by order of the Viceroy (Velasco, Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 188, MS.). In 1716 San Francisco mission was refounded a few leagues farther inland, across the Neche r. and among the Neche and Nacachau tribes. The site was evidently S. W. of Alto, Cherokee co., near the Neche Indian mounds. While here the mission was known as San Francisco de los Neches, or de los Texas. It was put in charge of a pioneer in that country, Fr. Francisco Hidalgo, and was designed to serve the Nabedache, Neche, Nacachau, and Nacono tribes (Hidalgo and Castellano to Mesquía, Oct. 6, 1716, MS. in Archivo Gen.), but it apparently did not succeed any better than before. In 1719 it was abandoned, like all of the E. Texas missions, because of fear of an attack by the French. On Aug. 5, 1721, it was reestablished by the Marquis de Aguayo and Espinosa, and put in charge of Fr. José Guerra. On this day Aguayo gave the Neche chief the baston, the symbol of authority conferred by the Spaniards, and clothed 180 Indians of all ages. Espinosa exhorted them to gather into a pueblo, to be named San Francisco Valero (Peña, Diario, Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 39, MS.). This they promised to do as soon as they could harvest their corn (ibid.). Still the mission failed to succeed. In 1727 Rivera found it without Indians, and described the settlement as one of huts (Diario, leg. 2, 140, 1736; Proyecto, folio 50, 1728, MS. in Archivo Gen.). In 1729 the presidio on the Angelina was withdrawn, and as a result the mission, together with those of San José de los Nzones and Nuestra Señora de la Purísima Concepción (q. v.), was removed in 1730. After an attempt had been made to find a site on the San Marcos, Nueces, and Frio rs., the mission was reestablished, in 1731, on San Antonio r. as San Francisco de la Espada (q. v.). The buildings of the mission were evidently mainly of wood, hence no remains have been identified. (H. E. B.)

San Francisco de Pima. A Pima rancheria, 10 or 12 leagues above the Rio Asunción from Pitic, about lat. 31°, Sonora, Mexico. Depopulated many years prior to 1763 (Rudo Ensayo, ca. 1763, 159, 1863).

San Francisco de Valero. The name assigned in 1721 to the Indian pueblo attached to San Francisco de los Neches (or Tejas) mission, near Neches r., in Cherokee co., Texas (Peña, Diario, 1721, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 39, MS.). See San Francisco de los Tejas, and Neché. (H. E. B.)

San Francisco Solano. The last Franciscan mission established in California. The removal of the sick Indians to San Rafael had proved so beneficial that the proposal was made to move the San Francisco (Dolores) mission to some more favored spot on the N. shore of the bay. The country was explored and the Sonoma valley favorably reported. The cross was first planted July 4, 1823, but work did not begin until Aug. 25, when a party arrived from San Francisco. Objections were raised to the transfer, however, and it was finally compromised by founding a new mission, the old ones not being disturbed. Neophytes were to be allowed to go to the new mission from San Francisco, San Rafael, and San José, provided they originally came from the Sonoma region, and new converts might come from anywhere, but no force was to be used. The mission church, 24 by 105 ft, was dedicated, Apr. 4, 1824, to San Francisco Solano. To avoid confusion it was commonly called Solano, and later Sonoma. At the close of 1824 there were 693 neophytes, of whom 322 had come from San Francisco, 153 from San José, 92 from San Rafael, and 96 were baptized at the new mission. In 1830 there were only 760 neophytes, though 650 had been baptized, and as only 375 had been buried, many must have run away. The highest number, 996, was reached in 1832. The mission was not particularly prosperous. The large stock numbered 2,729 in 1830, small stock 4,000; but these numbers were about doubled by 1834. The crops for several years averaged more than 2,000 bushels. There were 650 neophytes in 1834. The total number of baptisms was 1,312, of whom 617 were children. The mission was secularized in 1835-36 under Vallejo and Ortega. The movable property was given the neophytes, who were free to go where they pleased. Owing to troubles with hostile Indians they seem later to have restored their stock to the care of Vallejo, who managed it for the general welfare. Affairs seem to have prospered under his care, and Bancroft estimates that in 1840 there were still 100 ex-neophytes at Sonoma and 500 others in the neighborhood. Vallejo conducted several campaigns against hostile Indians. The pueblo of Sonoma was organized in 1835. In 1845, when Gov. Pico was planning the sale of the missions, Solano was declared without value. The buildings and immediate grounds, of course, as with all the missions, remained in the possession of the church. In 1880 these were sold, and for a time the old church was used as a barn. In 1903 the old buildings and grounds were purchased by William R. Hearst and deeded to the state of California. Some work has since been done to preserve the buildings from further ruin. The Indians in the neighborhood of this mission belong to the Olamentke division of the Moquelumnan family (q. v.), but many of the neophytes came from more distant stocks, the Copehan especially being well represented. The following names of villages, taken from the mission books, are given by Bancroft (Hist. Cal., II, 506, 1886): Aloquiomi, Atenomac, Canijolmano, Canoma, Carquin, Caymus, Chemoco, Chichoyomi, Chocuyem, Coyayomi (or Joyayomi), Huiluc, Huymen, Lacatiut, Linayto (Libayto?), Loquiomi, Locnoma, Malaca, Mayacma, Muticolmo, Napato, Oleomi, Paque, Petaluma, Polnomanoc, Putto or Putato (Pulto or Pultato or Pultoy = Putah cr.?), Satayomi, Soneto, Suisun, Tamal, Tlayacma, Topayto, Ululato, Utinomanoc, Zaclom. (A. B. L.)

San Francisco Solano. A Franciscan mission founded in March, 1700, s. of the Rio Grande, below Eagle Pass, Texas. In 1718 it was transferred to San Antonio, and refounded as San Antonio de Valero (q. v.), now the famous Alamo Mission. (H. E. B.)

San Francisco Vizarron. A Franciscan mission founded in 1737 in N. Mexico among Coahuiltecan Indians (Portillo, Apuntes, 313-17, 1888). The first tribes gathered there were Piguiques and Pausanes; later the Pasnacanes, Tinapihuayas, and Julimeños followed. In 1754 the mission was involved in a bitter dispute with the San Juan Capistrano mission over the Pamaques (Informe of 1754 in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 307-11, MS.). (H. E. B.)

San Francisco Xavier de Horcasitas. The first of three Franciscan missions founded by the College of the Santa Cruz de Querétaro in 1748-49 on San Xavier (now San Gabriel) r., Texas, the others of the group being San Ildefonso and Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria. Their location has not hitherto been definitely known, but the remains of the irrigation plant connected with these missions were in 1907 identified by the writer 9 miles n. w. of Rockdale, Milam co. As early as 1744 or 1745 Fr. Francisco María Año de los Dolores y Viana, missionary at San Antonio de Valero, began making visits to the tribes of central Texas, and soon those of the San Xavier region asked for missions in their own territory, although they refused to enter the missions at San Antonio (Arriçivita, Crónica, pt. II, 321-22, 1792; Decree of the Viceroy, Mar. 26, 1751, MS. in Lamar Papers). While the request was being considered in Mexico, Fr. Dolores ministered to the petitioners on the San Xavier and attracted thither other tribes from the E. and S. In Dec. 1746 three missions were authorized, but they were not formally established until 1748-49, the first one (San Francisco Xavier) being founded early in 1748.

The records of these missions are highly important for the ethnology of the tribes of middle and southern Texas, as they show that the tribes gathered at San Xavier were distributed among the three missions avowedly on the basis of linguistic grouping. In San Francisco Xavier were placed the group of Tonkawan affiliation, including the Tonkawa, Yojuane, Mayeye, and Ervipiame; to San Ildefonso were assigned the Bidai, Arkokisa, Deadose, and Patiri; and to Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria the Karankawan group, including Coco, Karankawa, and Tops (Documents in the College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro, K. leg. 6, nos. 12 and 18).

The successful beginning of these missions is proved by the fact that when Capt. Joseph de Eca y Musquiz inspected them some time before Mar. 11, 1751, he counted 431 neophytes—161 at San Xavier, 176 at San Ildefonso, and 102 at Candelaria. By that time 253 persons had been baptized, of whom 77 had died (Arricivita, op. cit.; Viceroy's decree, op. cit.). Some time before Musquiz had made his report (the chronology is not clear) an epidemic of smallpox attacked the Indians, carrying off 40 at San Ildefonso alone (Arricivita, op. cit., 328-29). Four times within one year the Apache molested San Xavier mission, killing 3 soldiers and 4 Indians, and stealing some horses. Soon after the epidemic the Indians of San Ildefonso were all induced by the Nabadache and other eastern tribes to desert and join in a general campaign against the Apache. When they returned they settled some leagues from the mission and did not reënter it (Arricivita, op. cit., 326). These misfortunes proved the necessity of a stronger military force to protect the missions and to control the neophytes. Accordingly, on Mar. 11, 1751, a presidio named San Xavier, garrisoned by 50 soldiers, was authorized (Decree of this date, in the Lamar Papers). It was assigned to Don Felipe Rábago y Teran, who took charge in December of that year (Dolores to the Viceroy, Oct. 28, 1760, MS. in Archivo Gen. de Mex.). A quarrel arose between Rábago and the missionaries; early in 1752 the Coco of Candelaria deserted; and a few days later (May 11) the missionary at San Ildefonso was murdered by an unknown hand. The addition of drought, strange natural phenomena, and another epidemic, to these misfortunes, caused the abandonment of the place in 1755 or 1756, the garrison and missionaries removing to San Marcos r. Shortly afterward some of the Mayeye of San Xavier mission were reassembled by the missionaries and taken to Guadalupe r., where they were ministered to for a short time (Arricivita, op. cit., 337; Dolores, Escrito, June 1756, MS. in the College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro). In the latter part of 1756 the garrison was removed from the Rio San Marcos to become a part of the new presidio at San Sabá (Arricivita, op. cit., 367). See Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria; San Francisco Xavier de Nájera; San Ildefonso. (H. E. B.)

San Javier.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 641, 1886.

San Francisco Xavier de Nájera. A Querétaran mission, nominally founded Mar. 10, 1722, on San Antonio r., Texas, between San Antonio de Valero and San José missions, under the protection of the presidio of San Antonio de Béjar, and put in charge of Fr. José Gonzales. It was founded for the Ervipiame Indians of Rancheria Grande (q. v.) near the Brazos, at the request of their chief, called by the Spaniards Juan Rodriguez, who, before Feb. 1721, brought 50 families of his followers to San Antonio. When Aguayo went to reestablish the E. Texas missions, he took Juan Rodriguez with him as a guide, and when he returned to San Antonio in 1722 he founded the mission, as stated. Juan Rodriguez was made "governor of the suburb (barrio) of the Hyerbipiamos." It seems that the material part of the mission was never supplied, and that the baptisms of the Ervipiame which followed were made at Valero mission. They were first entered in a separate book, and later transferred to the Valero records as "Baptisms of the Hyerbipiamos, whom it was attempted to place in a new mission with the name San Francisco Xavier, an attempt which failed because they remained in this mission of San Antonio." These entries, 32 in number, began Mar. 12, 1721 (before the mission was founded), and ended July 20, 1726 (Libro en que se Assientan los Baupismos de los Indios de esta Mision de S. Antº). Of these baptisms 24 were of persons of Ervipiame, Maruam, or Ticmamar blood. About 1748 a new mission, called San Xavier, was established on San Xavier r. for Rancheria Grande and other tribes, and it may be regarded, therefore, as the revived San Francisco Xavier de Nájera. San Francisco Xavier de Viggé-Biaundo. A Jesuit mission, commonly known as Biaundo, or Viaundo, founded in 1699 by Padre Picolo in Lower California. The 11 Indian settlements which belonged to it in 1702 are enumerated in Picolo's memoir of 1702 (Lettres Edifiantes, II, 62, 1841). Eight of these lay s. of the seat of the mission, which was in 25° 45' lat., a few m. s. w. of Loreto. According to Hervas, the natives spoke Cochimi. According to Venegas (Hist. Cal., II, 196, 1759) it had only five visitas in 1745, one of which was doubtless Jacuencacahel (q. v.). The population was 485 in 1768, including that of its subordinate villages. (A. S. G.)

San Gabriel Arcangel. The fourth Franciscan mission established in California. It was founded Sept. 8, 1771, at a place called by the natives Sibagna (or Tobiscagna, according to Taylor, Cal. Farmer, Feb. 22, 1860), a fertile and well-wooded spot on a stream afterward known as San Gabriel r., in Los Angeles co. The party with supplies had been sent up from San Diego, and included 10 soldiers for the protection of the new mission. The natives were at first friendly, and assisted in bringing timber and in helping to construct the buildings and stockade. Friction soon arose with the Indians, however, probably due to the outrages of the soldiers, and one native chieftain was shot. Owing to these troubles with the natives the number of soldiers was increased. These seem to have been an unruly lot, and their actions appear to have hindered the early growth of the mission, the whole number baptized during the first two years being only 73. In Fr. Junípero Serra's first annual report of 1773 he declared the native population in that region was larger than elsewhere, but that the various villages were hostile to one another, so that those near the mission, for example, could not go to the sea for fish. Situated as it was in a fertile region, the agricultural returns seem to have been very successful after the first year, so that later San Gabriel frequently furnished the other missions with supplies. Occupying also a position where the overland route from Sonora and the Colorado met that from Lower California, it soon became one of the most important of the missions. The natives seem to have been soon conciliated. The number of neophytes was 638 in 1783, and 1,040 in 1790. An uprising of the natives, including the neophytes, was threatened in 1785, but the scheme was frustrated without bloodshed, and the leaders were imprisoned. During the following years San Gabriel continued to flourish, despite the large number of deaths among the neophytes, nearly as many as the number of baptisms. There were numerous reports of threatened hostilities, but nothing serious occurred. The harsh treatment of the neophytes led many of them to escape, and some of these doubtless plotted revenge. The greatest number of neophytes, 1,701, was reached in 1817, after which there was a somewhat irregular but gradual decrease. The largest crop, amounting to 29,400 bushels, was raised in 1821. Among industrial experiments tried was a grist mill (the building for which is still standing), which, however, did not prove an entire success, as after about two years its use seems to have been abandoned. Later another mill was built. There were four chapels attached to this mission; that of the pueblo of Los Angeles was dedicated in 1822, though begun many years before. The others were Puente, San Antonio de Santa Ana, and San Bernardino (Guchama). This last seems to have been established about 1822 at the special request of the natives, and flourished till about 1834, when it was destroyed by hostile Indians. In the latter year there were 1,320 neophytes. Up to that time 6,814 natives had been baptized, of whom 2,459 were children. After secularization the wealth of the mission rapidly decreased, thousands of cattle being destroyed merely for their hides and tallow, so that by 1840 the livestock had practically disappeared. Most of the neophytes left the mission, though in 1844, 300 were reported as helping to attend the vineyards, all that was left of the productive property. In 1846 Gov. Pico sold the mission for debt, but the title was finally declared invalid. Since 1850 the church has been a regular parish church. The Indians in the neighborhood of this mission belong to the Shoshonean linguistic family, and have been given the collective name of Gabrieles (q. v.); included among these are those at San Fernando mission. There were also many neophytes from the Serrano (q. v.) villages farther e., and probably representatives of other groups also. The names of the rancherias associated with San Gabriel mission were: Acuragna, Alycupkigna, Awigna, Azucagna, Cahuenga, Chokishgna, Chowigna, Cucumogna, Hahamogna, Harasgna, Houtgna, Hutuegna, Isanthecogna, Maigna, Nacagna, Pascegna, Pasinogna, Pimocagna, Pubugna, Sibagna, Sisitcanogna, Sonagna, Suangna, Tibahagna, Toviscanga, Toybipet, Yangna. San Ignacio (Saint Ignace). A Pima rancheria on the n. bank of Rio San Ignacio, lat. 30° 45', lon. 111°, Sonora, Mexico, and the seat of a presidio and mission from early times. It was visited by Father Kino in 1694, and by Kino and Mange in 1699. Pop. 94 in 1730. In 1749–50 it was reported to be "more Pápago than Pima." Not to be confounded with San Ignacio de Tubac. (See Kino, 1694, in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., i, 254, 1856; Mange in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 358, 1889; Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 533, 1884.)

San Ignacio de Kadakaman (Kadakaman, 'sedge brook.'—Venegas). A former Cochimi village and Spanish mission, situated in the Sierra de San Vicente, lat. 28°, 40 leagues n. w. of Santa Rosalia Mulege, and 25 leagues n. e. of Guadalupe, Lower California. The mission of San Ignacio Kadakaman, or San Ignacio Loyola, was established in 1728 by Padre Luyando, but it was later consolidated with Nuestra Señora de los Dolores del Norte, 60 m. northward. San Ildefonso. The second of three Franciscan missions established in 1748–49 by the College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro on San Xavier (now San Gabriel) r., 9 m. n. w. of Rockdale, Milam co., Texas. The circumstances of its establishment are given under San Francisco Xavier de Horcasitas (q. v.). The principal tribes at San Ildefonso mission were the Arko-kisa, Bidai, and Deadose, all of which spoke the same language. Another tribe located there was the Patiri, probably of the same linguistic group, since the tribes were distributed among the three missions avowedly on the basis of linguistic differences. About 1750, it seems (the chronology is not clear), an epidemic visited the mission, during which about 40 persons died, all baptized. Some time before Mar. 11, 1751, Capt. Joseph de Eca y Musquiz counted at the mission 176 neophytes. Four months after the epidemic the remaining Indians deserted in a body, to join the Nabedache and other eastern tribes in a general campaign against the Apache, their mortal enemy (Arricivita, Crónica, 329, 1792). Later they returned and camped, to the number of 66 families, near San Xavier mission, where their minister served them for some time. They expressed a willingness to return to San Ildefonso, but this course was discouraged, because of the bad state of affairs at the establishments (Arricivita, op. cit., 337). Thus it seems that the San Ildefonso mission was not in operation after 1751. On May 11, 1752, Father Ganzabal, missionary of San Ildefonso, already deserted, was murdered at the Candelaria mission by an unknown hand. In 1756–57 a new mission, called Nuestra Señora de la Luz (q. v.), was founded for this group of tribes on the lower Trinity. (H. E. B.)

San Ildefonso. A Tewa pueblo near the e. bank of the Rio Grande, about 18 m. n. w. of Santa Fé, N. Mex. It became the seat of a Spanish mission at least as early as 1617, and had Santa Clara and San Juan as its visitas in 1680, but was itself reduced to a visita of Santa Clara in 1782. Bandelier has identified the Bove of Oñate with the pueblo of San Ildefonso, which in 1598 was situated about a mile from the present village. The Indians of this pueblo took a prominent part in the uprising against Spanish authority in 1696, and it was not until after the fourth assault of their nearby mesa stronghold by Vargas that they surrendered. In this revolt the two missionaries were killed and the church was burned (Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 82, 1892). The pueblo now (1910) numbers 110 inhabitants. The clans of San Ildefonso, so far as their names have been recorded, are Tan (Sun), Pe (Firewood), Tse (Eagle), Ton (Antelope), Po (Calabash), Pa (Fire), P'o (Water), Ku (Stone), Kuping (Coral), Kungye (Turquoise), Okuwa (Cloud), Kea (Badger), Te (Cottonwood), D'ye (Gopher), Kang (Mountain lion), Ye (Lizard), De (Coyote), Whapi (Red-tail hawk), Kwatsei (White bead), Tse (a mountain tree), Pang (Deer), Se (Blue bird), Kungtsa (White corn), Kungtsa (Blue corn), Kungpi (Red corn), Kungtsei (Yellow corn), Kungfeti (Black corn), Kungaii (Sweet corn), Kyunggang (Hawk), Koo (Buffalo). San Ildefonso. A former rancheria, apparently of the Soba, visited by Anza in 1774, and by Anza and Font in 1776; situated 4 leagues N. W. of Caborca, Sonora, Mexico. See Anza, cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 389, 1889.

San Ildefonso de Cieneguita. Mentioned by Bancroft (No. Mex. States, I, 524, 1884), together with Tubac, Pitiqui, Caborca, Cocospera, etc., as a mission of Sonora, Mexico. Whether it was inhabited by Pima, Papago, or Opata has not been determined.

Sanipao (Sa-ni-pa'-o). A former Coahuiltecan tribe, part of whom were Christianized at Nuestra Señora de la Purísima Concepción mission (q. v.), Texas. In Mar. 1755 a band of them, the first of the tribe recorded in the marriage book, appeared at Concepción, and in one day were instructed, baptized, and remarried to the wives "whom they had taken in the forests" (Concepción Casamientos, partidas 111-17). During the next two or three years there were numerous baptisms and marriages of persons of this tribe, some evidently newcomers, and thereafter an occasional one is recorded down to 1790, when the extant record ceases (ibid., passim). The language of the tribe is preserved in the Manual (1760) of Bartholomé García, who was stationed at the neighbor mission of San Francisco de la Espada. The Sanipao are mentioned in the Informe de Misiones of Mar. 6, 1762 (Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 167, MS.). Portillo's statement that this tribe was at Concepción at its foundation is probably incorrect, and is apparently based on the misleading statement in Revilla-Gigedo's Carta of 1793 (Portillo, Apuntes, 304, 1888).

San Joaquin's Band. A Paviotso band, named from its chief, formerly in Carson valley, at the forks, in W. Nevada. They were said to have numbered 170 in 1859.—Dodge in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 373, 1860.

San José (Saint Joseph). The fourteenth Franciscan mission founded in California, and the first one of the five new missions established by Fr. Lasuen in 1797-98 to fill the gaps between the older ones. The site chosen was about 15 m. N. of Santa Clara, and about 3 m. from the present town of Irvington, Alameda co. The native name of the site was Oroysom. The formal ceremonies of foundation were performed by Fr. Lasuen on June 11, 1797, and by the end of that year there were 33 baptisms, and 286 by 1800. In 1810 there were 545, but 1,104 deaths were reported during the decade. In 1820 there were 1,754 neophytes. The highest number, 1,886, was reached in 1831. The mission was prosperous from the beginning and continued so long after many of the others declined. In 1820 there were 6,859 large stock and 1,200 small stock; in 1830, 13,300 and 13,030, respectively. The average crop for the decade ending 1820 was 6,020 bushels, and for that ending 1830, 5,409 bushels. The first church was a wooden structure with a grass roof, but in 1809 a new church was dedicated. Even before the founding of the mission the Indians of its neighborhood, especially to the eastward, were somewhat feared, and San José seems to have had more trouble with the Indians than any other in California. The rather forceful methods used by the padres in obtaining neophytes, together with the ease with which they could escape to gentile or hostile villages, doubtless increased the difficulties. More than once expeditions to recover runaway neophytes were attacked. In 1826 a party of neophytes got into trouble with the Cosumni, and a punitive expedition was sent out, which brought in 40 captives. In 1829 there was an extensive campaign into the San Joaquin valley against rebellious natives headed by Estanislao, a former neophyte of the mission. After 1830 San José was more prosperous than any other mission in California. In 1834 the neophytes numbered about 1,400. The number of natives baptized up to that time was 6,670, of whom 2,488 were children. In 1840, 580 were still at the mission, with possibly 200 more scattered in the district. The mission was secularized in 1836, when the inventory showed a total valuation, excluding lands and church property, of $155,000. After 1840 the decline was rapid. In 1843 the mission was restored to the control of the padres. Two years later it was estimated that about 250 Indians still lived in the vicinity. In 1846 the mission was sold by Gov. Pico for $12,000, but this sale was not confirmed, and the Catholic Church retained control. The old mission church has now completely disappeared and a modern parish church has been built on the site. The only part of the old buildings remaining is a portion of the monastery. The Indians in the neighborhood of the mission belonged to the Costanoan linguistic stock, the Saklan, Karkin, and Mutsun divisions being doubtless represented. A large part of the neophytes, however, especially during the later years of its existence, came from San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys, and included representatives of the Moquelumnan, Copahan, and Mariposan (Yokuts) linguistic stocks. (A. B. L.)

San José. A former Diegueño village on upper San Luis Rey r., in San Diego co., Cal. It later became a part of Agua Caliente No. 1 res., on which Warner's ranch was situated. By court decision, the Indians, numbering only 14, were evicted in 1903, when they were assigned to a new reservation purchased for them at Pala. See Jackson and Kinney, Rep. Miss. Ind., 24, 1883; Ind. Aff. Rep., 175, 1902; 118, 1903.

San José. A group of Huichol rancherías under the jurisdiction of San Andrés Coamiata, situated about 10 m. n. w. of the latter place, in the Sierra de los Huicholes, Jalisco, Mexico. San José de Comondú. A Cochimi settlement in the central mountainous part of Lower California, lat. 26° 5', and the seat of the Jesuit mission founded by Padre Mayorga in 1708. In 1745 it had 3 visitas, one lying a league to the w., another 7 leagues n., and another 10 leagues e. on the Gulf shore (Venegas). In 1767 the population of the mission was 360, according to Clavigero, probably including the inhabitants of the visitas.

San José de los Nazones. A Franciscan mission founded July 10, 1716, by Fray Isidro Felix de Espinosa, author of the Crónica Apostólica among the Nazoni and for the Nazoni and Nadaco, E. of Angelina r. and about 20 m. n. w. of Nacogdoches, on a small stream flowing n., evidently one of the southern branches of Shawnee cr., Texas. The statement that it was between the Neches and the Trinity is incorrect, as is also the assertion that it was founded for the "Noaches," a tribe which did not exist in Texas. After three years of little success, the mission was abandoned in 1719, in common with all the others of E. Texas, through fear of a French invasion. On Aug. 13, 1721, it was reestablished on the same site by the Marqués de Aguayo and Father Espinosa. The church and the dwelling, which were found in ruins, were rebuilt, the chief of the Nazoni was reinstated as "governor," and Fray Benito Sanchez left in charge (Peña, Derrotero, folio 18, Mexico, 1722). In 1729 the presidio near the Angelina, which protected this mission, was withdrawn, and as a result the mission was suppressed in 1729–30. An attempt was first made to reestablish it on San Marcos r., then on the Nueces and the Frio, but finally a site was chosen on the San Antonio, 12 m. below the present city of that name. Here, on Mar. 5, 1731, the mission of San José was rechristened San Juan Capistrano (q. v.). While in E. Texas, the mission had never been very successful, for while the Indians were in the main friendly, they were indifferent to the faith, and refused to give up their life in

in 1598 in receiving the people of Yuguuingge after the voluntary relinquishment of their pueblo to the Spaniards, gained from the latter for their village the designation "San Juan de los Caballeros." In 1782, 500 of the inhabitants of San Juan and Santa Clara died of pestilence in two months. Besides the main pueblo of San Juan the Indians held a portion of the arable lands about Chamita, and a small colony of them dwell on the w. side of the Rio Grande at the so-called Pueblito. They claim Pioge, Sajiwingge, and Pojuuingge as ruins of their ancient villages. Pop. 404 in 1910.

The clans of San Juan are: Tan (Sun), Nan (Stone), Kopin (Coral), Na (Earth), Kunya (Turquoise), Pe (a mountain tree), Sepin ("Painted Eagle"), Oguwa (Cloud), Po (Calabash), Ta (Grass), Kun (Corn), Po' (Water), De (Coyote), Ke (Bear), Kan (Mountain lion), Keya (Badger), Ye (Lizard), Dye (Gopher), Te (Cottonwood). THE CHURCH OF SAN JOSÉ Y SAN MIGUEL DE AGUAYO present San Antonio, Texas, under the protection of the presidio of San Antonio de Béjar. It was long considered the most flourishing of the Texas missions, and in 1778 its church, worth $40,000, was said to be the finest in New Spain. The Indian population was 350 in 1762, up to which year there had been 1,054 baptisms. The mission also possessed 1,500 yoke of oxen. In 1785 the population was 106; in 1793, 114. It ceased to exist as an independent mission before the close of the century. See Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 1886; Garrison, Texas, 1904.

San Juan (Saint John). A Tewa pueblo near the E. bank of the Rio Grande, 25 m. N. W. of Santa Fé, N. Mex., before the establishment of which the Indians occupied and abandoned successively 3 other pueblos, immediately previous to the 16th century (Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 21, 61, et seq., 1892). When Oñate visited it in 1598, he established there the headquarters of the provincial government, and preparations were even made for building the permanent city of "San Francisco" in its vicinity (see Yugueningge). It was the seat of a Franciscan mission from an early date, and, owing partly to the generous character of its inhabitants

San Juan. A Timucua mission town in 1688, named in a letter from the chiefs of the tribe to the King of Spain (see copy and translation in Gatschet, Timucua Lang., in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., xviii, 497, 1880). It was visited by Dickenson in 1699, and was apparently situated on Little Talbot id., n. from St Augustine, Fla. (J. M.)

San Juan. An Apalachee mission town in n. w. Florida during the latter half of the 17th century. It was destroyed, with others of the same tribe, by the English and their Indian allies in the war of 1702-06. (J. M.)

San Juan. An Opata village of Sonora, Mexico, mentioned by Hrdlička (Am. Anthr., vi, 72, 1904) as one of the pueblos at which full-blood Opata may still be found.

San Juan. A Cochimi visitation town of the mission of San José de Comondu, in lat. 26°, central Lower California, in 1708.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., i, 404, 1759.

San Juan Bautista (Saint John the Baptist). The fifteenth Franciscan mission established in California. The site was chosen between San Carlos and Santa Clara, about 6 m. from the present town of Sargent, Santa Clara co. The native name was Popelout, or Popeloutchom. Here some buildings had already been erected by men from Monterey, and on June 24, 1797, President Lasuen founded the new mission. By the end of the year there had been 85 baptisms, and in 1800 the neophytes numbered 516. These increased to 702 in 1810, 843 in 1820, and 1,248 in 1823, after which the decline began. The stock and crops prospered from the beginning. In 1810 there were 6,175 large stock and 9,720 small stock; in 1820, 11,700 and 9,530 respectively. The average crop for the decade ending 1810 was

3,700 bushels; for that ending 1820, 3,300 bushels. In 1830 there was a considerable decrease in stock, but the crops remained good. For the first two or three years after its founding the mission had considerable trouble with the Ansaimé, who lived in the mountains about 25 m. to the e. These were finally defeated and a number of captives brought to the mission. A new mission church, begun in 1803, was dedicated in 1812. In 1832 there were 916 neophytes. The total number of baptisms from the time of its founding was 3,913, of whom 2,015 were children. In 1835, 63 Indians were emancipated, but after that time there is no further record. A number of whites settled in the region, and the place became known as the pueblo of San Juan de Castro. In 1846 the orchard, all that remained of the land improvements, was sold. The buildings continued in possession of the Catholic Church, and are still in use. The Indians in the neighborhood of San Juan Bautista belonged to the Costanoan linguistic family. In its later years it drew many of its neophytes from San Joaquin valley, and the Yokuts were probably well represented. García, according to Bancroft (Hist. Cal., II, 339, 1886), speaks of an expedition to the Mariposas, the rancheria of Nopochinches being named, in which 300 Indians of all ages and sexes were brought to San Juan Bautista. A list of the villages from which neophytes were drawn follows (Bancroft, op. cit., I, 557, 1886; Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Nov. 25, 1860), although several of them also supplied neophytes to San Carlos: Absayme (Ansaimas, Ausaima = Ansaimes), Absayruc, Asystarca, Calendaruc (Kalindaruk), Chapana, Echantac, Giguay, Guachurrone (Wacharones), Iratue, Jasniga, Jeboaltac, Lithenca, Mitaldejama, Mutsun (Mutsun), Onextaco, Onixaymas, Paisin (Pagosines or Paysines), Popelout, Pouxouoma, Poitokwis, Suricuama, Tamarox, Teboaltac (=Jeboaltac), Thithirii, Tipisastac (Tipsisstana = Tipsisstaca), Trutca, Uñijaima, Uchuchu, Xisca (or Xixcaca), Xivirca, Yelmus. (A. B. L.)

San Juan Bautista (so named by Oñate, who reached it on St John's day, June 24, 1598). Formerly a small pueblo on the Rio Grande, 16 m. above Sevilleta, N. Mex., at the site of the present Sabinal. Whether it was a Piro or a Tigua settlement is not known, since it was near the boundary of the territory of those two groups. In 1626 Sevilleta was mentioned as the last Piro settlement to the n.; therefore if San Juan Bautista belonged to that tribe it was abandoned between 1598 (the date of Oñate's visit) and 1626. (F. W. H.)

San Juan Capistrano. A Franciscan mission established by Fr. Junípero Serra, Nov. 10, 1776, at a place called in the native tongue Sajirit, or Quanis-Savit, at the present San Juan, Orange co., Cal. As soon as Franciscan missionaries, who were superseded by Dominicans in Lower California, arrived in San Diego, the ardent apostle to Alta California sent two friars to institute a mission at a roadstead 26 leagues n. of San Diego. They raised a cross on Oct. 30, 1775, but hastily returned when they learned that in the absence of the soldiers the natives had burned San Diego mission. No sooner was it rebuilt than Fr. Junípero proceeded to inaugurate the projected second mission, then hurried to San Gabriel and brought down the requisite stock of cattle escorted by a single soldier, and when a band of yelling, painted Indians threatened his life he won their confidence and friendship. The natives of this coast, well supplied by prolific nature, were not covetous of food or gifts, but remarkably eager for baptism. The inhabitants of the valley came from the other side of the Santa Ana mts., where they had a large rancheria called Sejat. About 2 m. from the mission they had one called Putuidem, and in its immediate vicinity they settled at Acagchemem (Geronimo Boscana in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 11, 1861). The fruitful plain soon yielded an exchangeable surplus of wheat, corn, and legumes. Juicy grasses nourished herds and flocks that doubled each year. The vine was first planted there and it grew wonderfully, and pomegranates, quinces, peaches, nectarines, and other fruits of Old Spain thrived as well. By 1783 there were 383 converts; in 1790 there were 741, and the mission herds had increased to 2,473 head, the small stock to 5,500, the grain crop to upward of 3,000 bushels. Houses for 40 neophyte families were constructed in 1794, some of them roofed with tiles. The weaving industry was introduced in 1797, and woolen blankets and cloth of native dye were produced, while the wool clip was abundant enough to supply other missions also. A stone church, the finest in California, that was nine years in building, was completed in 1806. It had a high tower and five interior arches of stone, all the work of the neophytes. Illegal sales of provisions to American and Russian trading vessels filled the coffers of the mission. The number of neophytes increased to 1,138 in 1810, the average crop to 5,570 bushels, and the large stock to 10,213 head, while the number of sheep, though still the largest among the missions, decreased in ten years from 17,030 to 11,500, but at the end of the following decade there were 15,000, with 11,500 cattle and nearly 1,000 horses, while the neophyte population, after reaching 1,361 in 1812, declined to 1,064. On Dec. 8, 1812, the new church was destroyed by an earthquake, and nearly 50 natives who were attending early mass were buried beneath the ruins. In 1830 the number of neophytes had declined to 926, cattle to 10,978, sheep to 5,000. Torrents gullied the fertile soil and weeds choked the crops, while the affairs of the mission were mismanaged. The missionary quarreled with the captain of the guard, and the neophytes grew lazy and insolent. In 1833 the earlier scheme of secularization was carried out at this mission as an experiment. The neophytes, of whom there were 861, were all released from mission restriction, provided with farms and farm stock, and constituted into a pueblo. In the following year their new liberties were abrogated and they were placed on a footing with the people of other missions. From the founding of the mission till 1834 the number of natives baptized was 4,317, 1,689 adults and 2,628 children. The number of deaths was 3,153. The civilian administrator was avaricious, and the neophytes deserted until only 80 were found at the mission in 1839. They clamored to be formed again into a pueblo, and the Government acceded to their desire on the condition of their working faithfully during a period of probation under the direction of the padre, but he was unwilling to take charge unless citizens were allowed to come in and the Indian alcaldes were held in control. During the next few years most of the Indians left for Los Angeles or elsewhere. In 1841 the Indians were fully emancipated and land was assigned to those who desired it in the newly founded pueblo of San Juan, but not more than 20 to 30 seem to have settled there. What remained of the mission grounds was sold in 1845 for $710. The ruins of the old stone church still remain as when overthrown. The Landmarks Club of California has secured a lease of the buildings and grounds, placed a roof, with the original tiles, on the old adobe church, supposed to have been built by Serra, besides making other repairs to preserve the buildings from further decay. The Indians in the neighborhood of this mission belong to the Shoshonean linguistic stock and are known as Juanefios (q. v.), though it is probable that the mission included neophytes from more distant groups. (F. H. A. B. L.)

A former settlement, probably of the Papago, and the seat of a Spanish mission; situated on the Rio Santa Cruz, in lon. 110° 30', just below the Arizona-Sonora boundary, at the site of the present town of that name. The mission was doubtless established by Father Kino about 1697. It was abandoned in 1845 on account of Apache depredations. San Lázaro.—Kino (1697) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., i, 276, 1856. San Lázaro.—Orozco y Berra, Geogr., 347, 1864. S. Lázaro.—Bernal (1697) in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 356, 1889. S. San Lorenzo (Saint Lawrence). A Franciscan mission, founded in Texas, Jan. 26, 1762 (not in 1761 as Arricivita says), for the Lipan after they were frightened from San Saba mission by the attack of the Comanche and others in 1758. The site was at El Cañon, on the Rio San Joseph, now the upper Nueces, and not the San Antonio, as has been conjectured (El Cañon is shown on the La Fora map, ca. 1767). The principal chief concerned was Cabezón, who was made "governor" of the pueblo of neophytes, called Santa Cruz. He stipulated and was granted three conditions before entering the mission. These were that the Spaniards should (1) protect his people from the Comanche during a great buffalo hunt, (2) aid them in a campaign against that tribe, and (3) deliver to him the captive daughter of the Natagé (Kiowa Apache) head chief (Report of Rábago y Terán, Jan. 31, 1761, MS. in Archivo Gen.). Two weeks afterward Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria (q. v.) was founded nearby.

A year after their establishment, Ximinez (quoted by Arricivita, Crónica 388, 1792) reported that about 400 Indians were in the two missions, of which this one was the more prosperous. El Cañon had been chosen as a retreat from the Comanche, and for some time it was unmolested, it seems; but in 1766 and 1767, in retaliation for two hostile campaigns by the Lipan, the Comanche three times attacked San Lorenzo mission (Candelaria was already abandoned). In the last attack it is said they killed and captured more than 30 Lipan and ran off more than 1,000 horses (Arricivita, op. cit., 392-93). In 1767 the Viceroy, on the recommendation of the Marqués de Rubi, ordered the mission abandoned. What are apparently the ruins of this mission are still plainly visible in Edwards co., about 40 m. N. W. of Uvalde. (H. E. B.)

Santa Cruz.—Rábago y Terán, Feb. 7, 1762. MS. in Archivo Gen. (properly the name of the Indian pueblo, not of the mission).

San Lorenzo. A former Suma pueblo, probably containing also some Piro and Tigua, near El Paso, on the Rio Grande, in Chihuahua. It was the seat of a Spanish mission from 1712, and had 440 inhabitants in 1790, but became a Mexicanized town on the extermination of the tribe. (F. W. H.)

San Lucas. A Cora pueblo on the upper waters of the Rio Jesus María, on the E. border of the Cora country, in the N. part of the territory of Tepic, Mexico.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., II, 16, map, 1902.

San Luis (Saint Louis). The district in W. Kansas once inhabited by the Apaches del Cuartelejo; so named by Juan Uribarri in 1706 (Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 229, 236, 1889). At this time, or shortly afterward, it was within the range of the Jicarillas. See Cuartelejo.

San Luis. A former Diegueño rancharia near San Diego, S. Cal.—Ortega (1775) quoted by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., I, 253, 1884.

San Luis Babi. A rancharia, probably of the Papago, visited by Father Kino in 1701; situated in N. W. Sonora, Mexico, between Busanic and Cocospera.

S. Luis Babi (?).—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 497, 1884.

San Luis de Apalache. A principal town and mission of the Apalachee, formerly situated, according to Fairbanks (Hist. Fla., 123, 1901), 2 m. W. of the present Tallahassee, Fla. The settlement is named in a letter of the chiefs to the King of Spain in 1688, and was destroyed, with the mission church and fort, by the English and their Indian allies under Gov. Moore in 1704. (J. M.)

San Luis de las Amarillas. A presidio established in 1757 on San Saba r., Texas, for the protection of San Saba mission (q. v.), on the other side of the stream. The ruins of this presidio are still to be seen at Menardville, Menard co. (H. E. B.)

San Luis Obispo. The fifth Franciscan mission established in California, on a site, called Tixlini by the natives, now included in the city of the same name. The mission, dedicated to San Luis Obispo de Tolosa, was founded by Fr. Junípero Serra on Sept. 1, 1772, the place being near the Cañada de los Osos, where Fages had earlier in the year spent three months hunting bears to supply the northern establishments with food. The natives were well disposed, willing to work, and offered their children for baptism, although the number of neophytes increased slowly. There was no rancharia near the mission, and the natives being well supplied with food, such as deer, rabbits, fish, and seeds, were not particularly desirous of settling at the mission. Crops seem to have been fairly successful from the first. In 1776 all the buildings except the church and the granary were burned by Indians who were enemies of those attached to the mission, the tule roofs of the buildings being fired by means of burning arrows. This led to the general adoption of tiles for roofing. In 1794 an unsuccessful attempt was made by outside Indians to cause the converts to revolt, but it ended with the imprisonment of five of the leaders. There were 492 neophytes in 1780, and 605 in 1790, while the highest number, 946, was reached in 1794. Want of water was reported as the chief drawback of the mission, though the average crop for the decade ending 1800 was 3,200 bushels, and for the next decade 4,456 bushels. About 1809 a chapel seems to have been built at San Miguelito. One was also established at Santa Margarita, the ruins of which still remain. Though the population of the mission gradually decreased after 1794, industries seem to have thriven for a time. Both woolen and cotton cloth was woven, and the Indians were reported as always well dressed. After 1820 the decline was more marked, so that by 1830 there were only 283 neophytes remaining, and marks of neglect were everywhere visible (Robinson, Life in Cal., 84, 1846). In 1834 there were 264 neophytes. The total number of natives baptized to 1834 was 2,608, of whom 1,331 were children. In 1840 there were still 170 ex-neophytes at the mission. The decline in wealth exceeded 50 percent. All the horses were stolen in 1840, and thenceforward the decline was rapid, so that in 1844 the mission was reported as having neither land nor cattle, while the neophytes were demoralized and scattered for want of a minister. The mission was sold in 1845 by Gov. Pico for $510. The ownership of the buildings was later confirmed of course to the Catholic Church, but both monastery and church have been so much rebuilt that they have little resemblance to the original structures. The Indians in the neighborhood of the mission belonged to the Chumashan (q. v.) linguistic family, though speaking a dialect rather different from the others. The following are a few of the villages: Chapule, Chiminer, Chofuate, De Impimu, De Qmchechs, Lteguie, Sesjala, Sespala, Tchena, Tgmaps, Walekhe (A. B. L.).

San Luis Rey de Francia (Saint Louis, King of France, commonly contracted to San Luis Rey). A Franciscan mission founded June 13, 1798, in San Diego co., Cal. It was the last mission established in California s. of Santa Barbara, and the last one by Fr. Lasuen, who was aided by Frs. Santiago and Peyri. The native name of the site was Tacayne. Occupying an intermediate position between San Juan Capistrano and San Diego, it seems to have been chosen chiefly because of the great number of docile natives in the neighborhood. On the day of the founding, 54 children were baptized, and the number of baptisms by the end of the year reached 214. Fr. Peyri, the head of the new mission, was most zealous and energetic, the natives were willing to work, and by July 1, 6,000 adobes were made for the new church, which was completed in 1802. Other buildings also were constructed, and neophytes rapidly gathered in, so that by 1810 the number reached 1,519, a more rapid growth than in any other mission, while the death-rate was the lowest. The mission also prospered materially, having in 1810, 10,576 large stock, 9,710 small stock, and an average crop for the preceding decade of 5,250 bushels. During the next decade the mission continued to prosper, the population reaching 2,603 in 1820, while the large stock numbered 11,852, the small stock 13,641, and the average crop was 12,470 bushels. In 1816 Fr. Peyri founded the branch establishment, or asistencia, of San Antonio de Pala, about 20 m. up the river. Here a chapel was built, a padre stationed, and within a year or two more than a thousand converts gathered. The mission attained its greatest prosperity about 1826, when it had 2,869 neophytes, but from this time it gradually declined. The mission lands were extensive, including ranches at Santa Margarita, Las Flores, Temecula, San Jacinto, and Agua Caliente, all of which were tended by the neophytes. At the time of secularization in 1834 San Luis Rey had the greatest number of neophytes of all the missions, namely 2,844, and also the greatest number of livestock. After secularization the decline was rapid, both in population and wealth. The Indians managed to retain partial control of some of the mission ranches for a few years longer, but soon had to give them up.

The total number of natives baptized up to 1834 was 5,401, of whom 1,862 were children. In 1846 Gov. Pico sold what was left of the mission buildings and ground for $2,437. Their agent was dispossessed by Frémont, and during most of 1847 the place was garrisoned by United States troops. It was also held as a sub-Indian agency for some time afterward. As with the other missions, the title to the buildings and the immediate grounds was finally confirmed to the Catholic Church. In 1892 the church was repaired, and the next year rededicated. Other buildings also have been repaired or rebuilt, and San Luis Rey is now a college for the training of missionaries. The chapel at Pala has likewise been restored, and while the original inhabitants have entirely disappeared, Pala has recently become the home of the Hot Springs Indians from Warner's ranch (see Agua Caliente), having 252 inhabitants in 1908. The Indians in the neighborhood of the San Luis Rey mission belong to the Shoshonean linguistic stock, and have been given the collective name of Luisenos (q. v.). (A. B. L.)

San Manuel (Saint Emanuel). A reservation of 640 acres of worthless land, consisting of dry hills, which has been patented to its 125 Mission Indian inhabitants; situated 10 m. from San Bernardino, Cal.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1902, 175, 1903; ibid., 1903, 147, 1904; Kelsey, Rep. Cal. Inds., 31, 1906.

San Marcos (Saint Mark). A ruined pueblo, 18 m. s. sw. of Santa Fé, N. Mex., which, according to Vetancurt, was formerly occupied by Keresan Indians. Bandelier, however, makes the statement that the aboriginal occupants were Tano, although there may have been Keres among them. A Spanish mission, with 600 neophytes, existed there at the time of the Pueblo rebellion of 1680, having as its visitas the pueblos of San Lázaro and Ciénega. The churches were destroyed during the revolt, the missionary, Padre Tinoco, was killed while at Galisteo, and the pueblo permanently abandoned. Twelve years later (1692), when Vargas visited the country, the pueblo was in ruins, with only a few of the walls standing. According to Meline (Two Thousand Miles, 220, 1867), the inhabitants joined the Tewa at San Juan. The name San Marcos was first applied by Gaspar de Sosa in 1591. The pueblo should not be confused with Kuakaa (q. v.), a prehistoric ruin 5 m. s. of Santa Fé, although San Marcos apparently bore the same Tano name. (F. W. H.)

San Marcos. A Cochimi visitation town of Santa Rosalia Mulege mission in 1745, on the E. shore of Lower California, 8 leagues N. of Mulege, probably on San Marcos id.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., II, 198, 1759.

San Marcos de Apalache. The principal town and mission station of the Apalachee in the 17th century, situated about the present St. Marks, Wakulla co., Fla. It is mentioned in a letter of the chiefs of the tribe to the King of Spain in 1688. In 1704 it was taken and entirely destroyed, with the church and other mission buildings, by the English and their Indian allies under Gov. Moore. (J. M.)

San Martin. A former Maricopa rancheria on Gila r., W. of the great bend, in S. W. Arizona; visited by Anza, Font, and Garcés in 1775. See Garcés (1775), Diary, 117, 1900.

S. Martin of the Opas.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 392, 1889.

San Martin. A former rancheria, probably Papago, visited by Father Kino in 1701; situated in S. W. Sonora, Mexico, between Busanic and Sonoita.—Kino cited by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 497, 1884.

San Mateo (Saint Matthew). A Timucua mission town in 1688, named in an address from the chiefs of the tribe to the King of Spain (see copy and translation by Gatschet in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., xviii, 497, 1880). There appears to have been another town of the same name, possibly a Spanish settlement, in W. Florida at a later date. (J. M.)

San Mateo. A former Jova pueblo and seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1677; situated in E. Sonora, Mexico, about lat. 29°. It was temporarily deserted in 1690, owing to Apache depredations. Pop. 596 in 1678, and only 95 in 1730.

San Miguel (Saint Michael) The sixteenth Franciscan mission established in California. The site chosen was at a place called by the natives Vahia, in the upper Salinas valley, between San Antonio and San Luis Obispo, in the N. part of the present San Luis Obispo co. Taylor (Cal.

Farmer, Apr. 27, 1860) says the name of the rancheria at the site of the mission was Chulam, or Chalomi. At this place Fr. Lasuen, on July 25, 1797, "in the presence of a great multitude of gentiles of both sexes and of all ages," formally founded the mission. The natives were very friendly, and 15 children were offered for baptism the same day. The mission grew rapidly in population and wealth. By 1800 there were 362 neophytes, and 973 in 1810, while the greatest number, 1,076, was reached in 1814. At the end of the first three years the mission had 372 horses and cattle, and 1,582 small stock, while the crops for that year (1800) were 1,900 bushels. In 1810 there were 5,281 cattle and horses, 11,160 small stock, with an average crop for the preceding decade of 3,468 bushels. During the next decade the stock increased considerably, but the crops began and continued to decline. In 1806 the mission lost a number of its buildings and a large quantity of supplies by fire, but the roof only of the church was injured. Shortly after 1818 a new church was completed. In 1828 the mission lands were reported as extending from the ocean to Tulare lake. In 1834 there were 599 neophytes. Up to this time the total number of natives baptized was 2,562, of whom 1,277 were children. The mission was secularized in 1836, and was generally prosperous until 1840, as its ranches and vineyards had not been granted to private individuals. The Indians lived at the mission and on the ranches, and in 1840 still numbered 350. In 1844, however, San Miguel was reported as without lands or cattle, while its neophytes were demoralized and scattered for want of a minister. The mission was sold in 1845, but the purchase was later declared invalid. The church and monastery were preserved and are still in use. The church is particularly interesting because of the interior decorations, which have been practically undisturbed since the days of the first padres. The Indians of this mission belonged to the Salinan (q. v.) linguistic family, though among the neophytes were many, probably Yokuts, from San Joaquin valley, with whom the natives around the mission are said to have been on intimate terms. (A. B. L.)

San Miguel. A former village of the Tubar on the extreme headwaters of the Rio Fuerte, in S. W. Chihuahua, Mexico. Although now largely Mexicanized, it is still the chief seat of the Tubar people.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., I, 443, 1902.

San Miguel. A Cochimi settlement and visita of Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe mission in Lower California, from which it was distant 6 leagues S. E., in 1745.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., II, 198, 1759.

San Miguel de la Frontera (Saint Michael of the Frontier). A Dominican mission established by Fathers Valdellon and Lopez, in 1782, about lat. 32° 10', Lower California, 30 m. s. e. of San Diego, Cal. The rancherias connected with the mission in 1860 were Otat, Hawai, Ekquall, Hassasei, Inomassi, Nellmole, and Mattawottis. The inhabitants spoke a Diegueño dialect. See Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 18, 1860.

San Miguel of the frontiers.—Taylor cited by Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app., 51, 1869.

San Miguel de Linares. A Franciscan mission established among the Adai, near Sabine r., La., in 1716. In 1719 a force of French, with Natchitoch and Caddo allies, took possession of it, and the Indians destroyed the buildings, but the mission was reestablished by the Spaniards with 400 Adai 2 years later. It reported 103 baptisms in 1768, and was abandoned in 1773.

Adas.—Garrison, Texas, 75, 1903. Los Adas.—La Harpe (1719) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. San Miguel de los Noches ('Saint Michael of the Noches,' here referring to a Yokuts tribe sometimes called Noches, who lived in the vicinity). A rancheria situated probably on the site of the present Bakersfield, Kern co., s. Cal., in 1776.

San Miguel de los Noches por el Santo Principe.—Garcés, Diary (1775-76), 299, 1900.

San Miguel Zuaque. A settlement of the Zuaque division of the Cahita, on the s. bank of Rio del Fuerte, 20 m. above its mouth, in n. w. Sinaloa, Mexico. The inhabitants used both the Zuaque and the Vacoregue dialects.

San Miguel Zuaque.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 332, 1864. S. Michael.—Kino, map (1702), in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 1726. S. Miguel.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., map, 1864.

Sannak. A fishing settlement of Aleut on Sannak id., e. Aleutians, Alaska; pop. 132 in 1890.—Eleventh Census, Alaska, 163, 1893.

Sannio. A Cayuga village on the e. side and at the foot of Cayuga lake, N. Y., in 1750.—De Schweinitz, Life of Zeisberger, 57, 1870.

Sannup. A word said to have been used in Massachusetts as a designation for an Indian married man. It is mentioned first in the Voyages into New England of Levett (1628), whose travels did not extend southward beyond the boundaries of Maine, and who remarks, "The sagamores will scarce speak to an ordinary man, but will point to their men and say "sanops must speak to sanops and sagamores to sagamores." Cotton Mather, in his Magnalia (ca. 1688), uses the word in his classification of Indian society, in which he states that the highest class consisted of the "nobles," comprising all those who were descended from blood royal, those who were invested with authority by the sachem and who had always been considered as noble; and, second, the "yeomen" or "sannups," who formed the mass of the community, and possessed a right in the lands of the tribe, etc.; and, third, the "villains" or "serfs," who had no property in the land, and were in some degree subject to the sannups or ordinary citizens. The word was not known to the Massachuset Indians, but by the whites who used it, like the words skunk, wigwam, musquash, and sagamore, was borrowed from the dialects of the Abnaki, in which it occurs in the following forms: Norridgewock seenanbe, Passamaquoddy senanbe, Penobscot sanamba, 'man,' vir (in contradistinction to ärënanbe, älënanbe, 'true man,' homo). The suffix -anbe means 'man,' but the meaning of the prefix seen-, sen-, is not known. (W. R. G.)

San Pablo (Saint Paul). A former Yuma rancheria on the Rio Colorado, 8 or 10 m. below the present Yuma and about a league s. of Pilot Knob, in California. It was visited by Garcés, Anza, and Font in 1775, and was on or near the site of the later mission of San Pedro y San Pablo (q. v.). See Coues, Garcés Diary (1775-76), 19, 163, 1900.

San Pablo. A former Yuma rancheria on the s. bank of the Rio Gila, Ariz., 3 leagues above its mouth. It was visited by Father Kino in 1699.

S. Pablo.—Kino, map (1701), in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 360, 1889. S. Paulus.—Kino, map (1702), in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 74, 1726. S. Pablo.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., I, map, 1759 (located where San Pedro should be).

San Pascual (Holy Easter). A small band of Diegueño Indians in San Diego co., S. Cal. "The maps show an Indian reservation named San Pascual, but actually there is no such reservation. A reservation was selected for these Indians comprising certain descriptions of land in township 12 s., range 1 w., in San Diego co. By some inexcusable error, the land was actually reserved in township 11 s., range 1 w. None of the San Pascual Indians ever lived on the land actually reserved, as that was considered to be Shoshonean territory, and the San Pascual are Yuman. Both pieces of land are barren and of little value. The Indians actually occupied the land in township 12. In the years that have passed, all the land in the intended reservation worth filing on has been taken up by the whites in the usual manner" (Kelsey, Rep. Cal. Inds., 30, 1906). In 1909 the San Pascual Indians numbered 71, under the Mesa Grande school superintendent.

San Pascual.—Burton (1856) in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 114, 1857. San Pasqual.—Sleigh in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 32, 1874.

San Pascual. A former pueblo of the Piro on the e. bank of the Rio Grande, opposite the present San Antonio village (which occupies the site of Senecú), Socorro co., N. Mex. Shea (Cath. Miss., 82, 1855) states that a mission existed there and that it was destroyed during the rebellion of 1680. According to Bandelier, however, the village in all probability was abandoned about 1675, since Senecú, on the opposite side of the river, was destroyed early in that year by the Apache. Consult Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 250, 1892. See also Piro.

San Pascual. A former Yuma rancheria on Gila r., Ariz., 16 to 20 leagues above its mouth, visited by Anza and Font in 1775.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 392, 1889.

San Pascual. A village of the Gidane-muk, a branch of the Serranos of s. California, visited and so named by Fray Francisco Garcés in 1776.

San Pascual.—Garcés, Diary, 273, 1900.

San Pedro (Saint Peter). A Yuma rancheria on the Rio Gila in Arizona, 3 leagues above its junction with the Colorado. It was visited by Father Eusebio Kino in 1699.

S. Pedro.—Kino, map (1701), in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 360, 1889 (see p. 359). S. Petrus.—Kino, map (1702), in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 74, 1726. S. Peter.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., i, map, 1759 (located where San Pablo should be).

San Pedro. A Mohave rancheria, visited and so named by Fray Francisco Garcés in 1776; situated on or near the w. bank of the Rio Colorado, lat. $35^{\circ} 01'$, about 8 m. n. w. of Needles, s. e. Cal.—Garcés, Diary (1776), 234, 416, 1900.

San Pedro de los Jamajabs.—Garcés, op. cit.

San Pedro. A Timucua mission on the present Cumberland id., Fla., named in 1688 in an address from the chiefs of the tribe to the King of Spain, a translation of which appears in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., xviii, 497, 1880.

San Pedro. A rancheria of the Tejas (Hainai), on a stream of the same name, at which the Franciscan mission of San Francisco de los Tejas (q.v.) was founded in 1690. It contained 80 men in 1782 (Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 665, 1886). See Nabedache.

San Pedro. One of the principal settlements of the Mayo, situated in s. Sonora, Mexico.—Hrdlička in Am. Anthr., vi, 59, 1904.

San Pedro Guazave. A former settlement of the Guazave (Vacoregue) on the e. bank of Rio Sinaloa, about lat. $25^{\circ} 40'$, n. w. Sinaloa, Mexico.

Guazave.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., map, 1864. San Pedro Guazave.—Ibid., 332.

San Pedro Martire (Saint Peter the Martyr). A Dominican mission, founded May 28, 1794, by Father Pallas, about 40 m. e. of Santo Tomás mission, lat. $31^{\circ} 50'$, Lower California.

San Pedro Martyr.—Taylor in Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app. 50, 1889.

San Pedro y San Pablo (Saint Peter and Saint Paul). A mission established by Fray Francisco Garcés in 1780 among the Yuma on the w. bank of Colorado r., near the site of modern Fort Defiance (Pilot Knob), 8 or 10 m. below Yuma, in extreme s. e. California. On July 17–19, 1781, the mission was sacked and burned by the natives, about 50 Spaniards, including Garcés, three other friars, and Capt. Rivera y Moncada were killed, and the women and children made captives. See Concepción, Missions, San Pablo.

Seraf., 504–511, 539, 1792; Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 397, 1889; Coues, cited above. San Pedro y San Pablo de Bicunier.—Coues, Garcés Diary, 19, 1900.

San Pedro y San Pablo. A Cochimi settlement and visita in 1745, situated 8 leagues e. of the parent mission of Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe, lat. 27° , Lower California.

San Pedro and San Pablo.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., ii, 198, 1759.

Sanpet. A body of Ute formerly occupying San Pete valley and Sevier r., central Utah. Powell found 36 on the Uinta res., Utah, in 1873, although they are said to have numbered 500 in 1865. They are now included under the collective name of Uinta Ute. (H. W. H.)

Land Pitches.—Farnham, Travels, 58, 1843. Sam-petches.—De Smet, Letters, 37, 1843. Sampiches.—Prichard, Phys. Hist. Rep. 1849, 67, 1860.

Sanpoil. A body of Salish on Sans Poil r. and on the Columbia below Big bend, Wash. Gibbs classed them as one of the 8 bands of Spokane and also as one of the 6 bands of Okinagan, they being claimed by both tribes. In 1905 they were reported to number 324, on the Colville res., but in 1909 their population was given as only 178, the disparity being attributed to duplication in previous counts. No treaty was ever made with these Indians for their lands, the Government taking possession of their country except such portions as have been set apart by Executive order for their occupancy.

San Rafael. The next to the last Franciscan mission established in California; founded as an asistencia or branch of San Francisco (Dolores). The mortality among the Indians in San Francisco had become so great that a panic was feared, and a transfer of a portion of the survivors to some situation on the N. side of the bay was proposed. At first they were sent over without a priest, but after several had died it was determined to found a new establishment; this was done, Dec. 14, 1817, the new mission being dedicated to San Rafael Arcángel. The native name of the place was Nanaguami. About 230 neophytes were transferred from San Francisco, most of whom, however, originally came from the N. side of the bay. An adobe building, 87 by 42 ft, divided into rooms for chapel, dwelling-rooms, etc., was finished in 1818. Two years later there were 590 neophytes, and 1,140, the highest number reached, in 1828. By 1823 the establishment was recognized as a separate mission. Its wealth was never very great, though it was prosperous, having in 1830, 1,548 large stock and 1,852 sheep, with an average crop for the preceding decade of 2,454 bushels. In 1830 there were 970 neophytes, the number decreasing about 50 percent in the next four years. At the time of secularization considerable property was distributed among the Indians; but in 1837, under the plea that the natives were not making good use of it, this was again brought together, with a promise of redistribution under more favorable circumstances. In 1839 the Indians were reported to be greatly dissatisfied, and in 1840 a distribution of the livestock was ordered. There were then 190 Indians near the mission, and probably 150 more scattered elsewhere. In 1846 Frémont took possession of the mission. After he left, it seems to have been unoccupied, and it has now entirely disappeared. The neophytes probably belonged chiefly to the Olamentke division of the Moquelumnan family. (A. B. L.)

San Rafael. Formerly a rancheria of the Papago in S. Arizona, near the headwaters of the Rio Salado of Sonora, Mexico; visited in 1701 and 1702 by Father Kino and sonamed by him. Possibly identical with the modern Mesquite or Quijotoa (q. v.), but not to be confounded with the mission of Guevavi, which bore the same saint name, nor with San Serafin (Actum).

San Rafael.—Kino (1700) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., I, 318, 1856. S. Rafael.—Kino, map (1701), in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 360, 1889; Venegas, Hist. Cal., I, map, 1759. S. San Rafael. A former rancheria in S. Arizona, probably Maricopa, visited by Kino and Mange in 1699 (Mange cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 358, 1889). Not to be confounded with the San Rafael in the Pima country.

San Rafael de los Gentiles. Mentioned by Bancroft (Ariz. and N. Mex., 281, 1889) as a pueblo settlement of New Mexico with 15 inhabitants, about 1765. Locality not known.

San Rudesindo. A rancheria of the Quigiyuma, visited and so named by Father Kino in Mar. 1702. Doubtless situated on the E. bank of the Rio Colorado, just above its mouth, in N. W. Sonora, Mexico. See Venegas, Hist. Cal., I, 310, 1759; Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 500, 1884; Coues, Garcés Diary, 178, 1900.

San Sabá. A Franciscan mission established on the Rio San Sabá in Texas, in Apr. 1757, among the Lipan Apache, under the protection of the presidio of San Luis de las Amarillas, 1½ leagues distant, named in honor of the Viceroy of Mexico. The Spaniards were induced by the Lipan to found the mission in order that they might gain the aid of the former against their enemies the Comanche, but after its establishment the Lipan refused under various pretexts to become concentrated under mission influence. On Mar. 2, 1758, the Comanche and their allies (Wichita and others) raided the Spanish horse herd and captured 62 head, and on the 16th 2,000(?) mounted hostiles gained entrance to the mission under protestations of friendship, murdered nearly all the occupants, and burned the buildings. But few of the Lipan were killed, most of them having fled to the mountains on the approach of the Comanche. In the following year an expedition against the raiders was made, and in an attack on a rancheria 150 leagues away, 55 of the foe were killed, but little else was accomplished, the Spaniards fleeing when a band of warriors, said to number 6,000, of different tribes, at a place called San Teodoro in the Wichita (Taovayases) country, made a stand against them. See Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 646, 1886; Garrison, Texas, 1904.

San Sabas. A visitation town in 1745, situated 3 leagues from the parent mission of San Ignacio de Kadakaman, about lat.

28° 40', Lower California. Its inhabitants spoke a Cochimi dialect. See Venegas, Hist. Cal., II, 198, 1759.

San Salvador (Holy Savior). A former rancheria, evidently of the Sobaiipuri, on San Pedro r., above Quiburi, s. Ariz.—Kino, map (1701), in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 360, 1889.

Sans Arcs (French trans. of Itazipcho, 'without bows,' from itazipa, 'bow,' and cho, abbrev. of chodan, 'without'). A band of the Teton Sioux. Hayden, about 1860, says that they and the Hunkpapa and Siharapa "occupy nearly the same district and are so often camped near each other, and are otherwise so connected in their operations as scarcely to admit of being treated separately." On the other hand, Warren (Dakota Country) indicates that their closest relations were with the Miniconjou.

Their divisions as given by Swift in a letter to Dorsey (1884) are: 1 Itazipcho (Without bows); 2 Shinalutao (Scarlet-cloth earring); 3 Wolutayuta (Eat-dried-venison-from-the-hind-quarter); 4 Mazpegnaka (Wear-metal-in-the-hair); 5 Tatankacheeli (Dung-of-a-buffalo-bull);

6 Shikshichela (Bad-ones-of-different-kinds); 7 Tiyopaoshanunpa (Smokes-at-the-entrance-to-the-lodge).

The Sans Arcs entered into a peace treaty with the United States at Ft. Sully, S. Dak., Oct. 20, 1865, and were a party also to the treaty of Ft. Laramie, Wyo., Apr. 29, 1868.

San Simon. A mission village, probably on St Simon id., Georgia coast, the inhabitants of which were among those revolting against the Spaniards of Florida in 1687.—Barcia, Ensayo, 287, 1723.

San Simon y San Judas. A former Papago rancheria, visited and so named by Father Kino in 1700; situated in Sonora, Mexico, about lon. 111°, lat. 31°, between Cocospera and Busanic.

San Simon y San Judas.—Mange cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 359, 1889. S. Simon.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 497, 1884.

Santa Aguida. A Cochimi rancheria in 1706, probably in the vicinity of San Ignacio Kadakaman mission, on the shore of Amuna in Lower California.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., i, 421, 1759.

Santa Ana (Saint Ann). A Keresan pueblo on the n. bank of the Rio Jemez, a w. affluent of the Rio Grande, in central New Mexico. The original pueblo of the tribe, according to Bandelier, stood near the Mesa del Cangelon, w. of the Rio Grande and n. of Bernalillo; but this was abandoned prior to the Spanish explorations in the 16th century, and another pueblo built on an elevation that rises about midway between Santa Ana and San Felipe, on the great Black mesa of San Felipe. This was the village visited in 1598 by Oñate, who referred to it as Tamy and Tamaya—the latter being the name applied by the inhabitants to 1692 the Santa Ana tribe occupied a mesa known as Cerro Colorado, some 10 m. n. and eastward from Jemez, but were induced by Vargas to return to their former locality, where they constructed the pueblo occupied to-day. This, like the two former villages, is also known to the natives as Tamayá. In 1782 Santa Ana was a visita of the mission of Sia. Population 253 in 1890, 226 in 1905, and 211 in 1910. The clans of Santa Ana are: Tinha (Turkey), Dyami (Eagle), Yak (Corn), Hooka (Dove), Shutsan (Coyote), Showita (Parrot), Hakan (Fire).

Santa Barbara. The tenth Franciscan mission founded in California. The presidio of Santa Barbara was established in 1782, soon after the founding of San Buenaventura mission, and it was the intention to found a mission at Santa Barbara also, but owing to lack of agreement between the civil authorities and the padres as to the method of organization of the proposed seat, it was not founded both this pueblo and its predecessor. It was early the seat of a Spanish mission; but at the outbreak of the Pueblo rebellion in 1680 it had no priest, yet was not without a church and monastery. In that revolt the Santa Ana people joined those of San Felipe in the massacre of the missionaries at Santo Domingo and the colonists in the Rio Grande valley. As the pueblo was situated w. of the Rio Grande, it was not molested by Gov. Otermín during his attempt to reconquer New Mexico in 1681, but in 1687 Pedro Romero de Posada, then governor at El Paso, carried the pueblo by storm after a desperate resistance, and burned it, several Indians perishing in the flames. When Vargas made his appearance in till several years later. Finally, on Dec. 4, 1786, the cross was raised and blessed by Fr. Lasuen at a place called Taynayan by the natives, a mile or so from the presidio. Owing to it being the rainy season, buildings were not begun until later. By 1790 there were 438 neophytes. A church 18 X 90 ft, and numerous other buildings, all roofed with tiles, had been completed. In the next 10 years the number of neophytes increased to only 864, though 1,237 were baptized and only 624 had died. Probably some of the others had been allowed to live in their own villages away from the mission. A new church was finished in 1794, and by 1800 quite a number of new buildings had been erected. At that time there were 60 neophytes engaged in making and weaving cloth, while a carpenter and a tanner were regularly employed to teach the natives those trades. Within the next few years 234 adobe houses were erected for the neophytes. In 1803 a mission chapel was built at San Miguel. In 1801 an epidemic carried off a great number of the natives and caused the neophytes, through a pretended revelation of their old deities, temporarily to renounce Christianity, though the Fathers knew nothing of this until later. The greatest number of neophytes, 1,792, was reached in 1803; in 1810 there were 1,355. The crops were good, averaging 6,216 bushels for the preceding decade; the large stock numbered 5,070, and small stock 8,190. During the following decade the crops increased somewhat, but the stock declined. The earthquake of 1812 injured rather seriously the church, and a new one, 40 X 165 ft, was begun in 1815, and completed and dedicated in 1820. This is still standing. The walls are 6 ft thick, of irregular sandstone blocks laid in cement, while the towers, 20 ft square, are, with the exception of a narrow passageway in one of them, solid masses of stone and cement to a height of 30 ft. In 1820 there were 1,132 neophytes, in 1830 only 711. In 1824 there was considerable trouble with the neophytes; a revolt had arisen at Santa Inés, and the Indians from Santa Barbara demanded that the soldiers at the mission leave their arms and withdraw to the presidio. This demand finally led to a conflict, and the natives fled to the hills and later to San Joaquin valley. After the revolt at Santa Inés and Purísima had been quelled, the Indians were finally induced to return by the granting of a general pardon. The padres and the church property were at no time interfered with. In 1834 there were 556 neophytes. The total number of natives baptized up to that time was 4,658, of whom 2,168 were children. In 1840 there were still probably 250 ex-neophytes at the mission. The mission continued prosperous even after its secularization, and the buildings were kept in better condition than at other places. In 1843 it was returned to the control of the padres, who, in 1844, reported that they had the greatest difficulty in supporting the 285 souls dependent on them. In 1846 the mission was sold for $7,500, though the principal buildings, as elsewhere, remained in the possession of the Church, and have been better preserved than at any other California mission. The Indians connected with Santa Barbara belonged chiefly to the Chumashan (q. v.) linguistic family, though Yokuts were also probably represented, as many neophytes are reported as coming from the "Tulares." (A. B. L.)

Santa Barbara. A former rancharia, probably of the Papago, visited by Father Kino in 1706; situated 4 m. s. w. of Buzanico, near the headwaters of the n. branch of Altar r., in Sonora, Mexico.—Kino cited by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 501, 1884.

Santa Catalina (Saint Catherine). A mission town, probably Yamasee, perhaps on St Catherine id., Ga. Its inhabitants revolted in 1687 against the Spaniards, destroyed the mission, and fled to the English in Carolina.

Santa Catalina.—Barcia, Ensayo, 287, 1723. St. Catherine s.—Shen, Cath. Miss., 73, 1855.

Santa Catalina. A former Tepehuano pueblo in lat 25° 10', lon. 106°, s. w. Durango, Mexico, the seat of a Jesuit mission founded by Geronimo Ramirez in 1596, but abandoned in 1616.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 318, 1864.

MISSION OF SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA

ent, May 18, 1797, in the n. part of Lower California, 50 m. n. of Santo Tomás mission, about lat. $31^{\circ} 20'$. It was destroyed by the Indians between 1827 and 1833. This was the last mission established in Lower California. According to Duflot de Mofras (Voy., i, 217, 228, 1844) the Indians living there were the Gueymura. See also Taylor in Browne, Pac. Slope, app., 51, 1869.

Santa Catarina. A settlement of the Huichol, consisting of only 11 houses and a temple, in the valley of the middle Rio Chapalagana, a n. r. tributary of the Rio Grande de Santiago, in Jalisco, Mexico.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., ii, 16, map, 147, 1902.

Tlapáli.—Lumholtz, ibid., 147 ('where there is amole: Huichol name)

Santa Clara. The eighth Franciscan mission established in California. The site first chosen was near Guadalupe r., not far from the head of San Francisco bay, and about 3 m. from its present position. This site was called Thamien by the natives. Here the mission was founded, Jan. 12, 1777, and dedicated to Santa Clara de Asis. Cattle and supplies arrived from Monterey and San Francisco, and work on the buildings was immediately begun. The Indians were at first friendly, but soon began to steal cattle, and did not entirely desist even after 3 were killed and several flogged. By the end of the year there had been 67 baptisms, mostly children. In 1779 the mission was twice flooded, and it was decided to rebuild at another site on higher ground. A new church was begun in 1781 and finished in 1784, the finest erected in California up to that time. This church was considerably damaged by earthquakes in 1812 and later, and a new one was finally built on the present site in 1825-26. Shortly after 1800 there was considerable trouble with the natives. Many of the neophytes seem to have run away at different times, and the expeditions sent out to bring them back were attacked in a few cases. The wealth of the mission increased rapidly. In 1790 the large stock numbered 2,817, small stock 846; in 1800 there were about 5,000 each, while in 1810 the numbers were 8,353 and 10,027, respectively, with average crops for the two decades of 4,800 and 4,970 bushels. The converts also increased rapidly, numbering 927 in 1790, 1,247 in 1800, 1,332 in 1810, and 1,357 in 1820. The highest figure, 1,464, was reached in 1825, after which the decline was very rapid. The stock and the yearly crops of the mission had decreased considerably before this time. The total number of natives baptized up to 1834 was 7,711, of whom 3,177 were children. The death-rate at the mission was very high. In 1834 there were about 800 neophytes, while in 1840 there were only 290, with possibly 150 more scattered in the district. The mission was secularized in 1837. By 1840 two-thirds of the stock and apparently all of the available property had disappeared. The mission was returned to the control of the padre in 1843, and two years later there were about 150 ex-neophytes connected with the mission. After this Santa Clara mission became a regular parish church, and in 1851 Santa Clara College was established in the old mission buildings. The growth of the college necessitated the renovation and enlargement of the buildings, so that now there is little remaining of the old adobe structures. The Indians in the neighborhood of the mission belonged to the Costanoan linguistic family, and these doubtless furnished the majority of the neophytes, yet it is probable that the Mariposan (Yokuts) and Moquelumnan stocks were also represented. (A. B. L.)

Santa Clara. A Tewa pueblo on the w. bank of the Rio Grande, about 30 m. above Santa Fé, in Rio Arriba co., N. Mex. The native name of the pueblo is K'hapóo, said to mean "where the roses (?) grow near the water." The natives assert that their ancestors dwelt in the clusters of artificial grottos excavated in cliffs of pumice-stone (Puye and Shufinne) w. of the Rio Grande, and this may be true of both historic and prehistoric times; but the Santa Clara people probably were not the only Tewa occupants of these cliff-lodges. Santa Clara was formerly the seat of a Spanish mission, with a church and monastery erected between 1622 and 1629, and was a visita of the mission of San Ildefonso (q. v.) until 1782, when it was again made a mission with San Ildefonso as its visita. Like Sia and Nambe, this pueblo, according to Bandelier, doubtless owed its decline to the constant inter-killing going on for supposed evil practices of witchcraft, or to the ravages of disease, for in 1782 500 deaths occurred in this and San Juan pueblos alone within two months (Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 23, 1892). Not to be confounded with the Tano pueblo of Tuerto, whose aboriginal name is the same as that of Santa Clara. The Santa Clara clans are: Tang (Sun), Khung (Corn), Tse (Eagle), Kea (Badger), Pe (Tree or Firewood), Te (Cottonwood), Na (Earth), Po (Calabash), D'ye (Gopher), Kunya (Turquoise), Kupi (Coral), Yan (Willow), and Pa (Deer). There are also said to be an Oak and a Cloud clan. Pop. 277 in 1910. (F. W. H.)

Santa Clara. A collective term used to designate the Indians formerly living within the territory or under the influence of Santa Clara mission, Santa Clara co., Cal. They were Thamien, with their divisions into Gergecensens and Socoisukas (Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Nov. 23, 1860).

Santa Clara. A former village in California, so called by the padres of San Carlos mission. Its people are said to have been Esselen.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Santa Coleta. A group of rancherias, evidently of the Alchedoma, near the Rio Colorado in w. Arizona, about 50 m. below the mouth of Bill Williams fork. They were visited and so named by Fray Francisco Garcés in 1776.

Rancherias de Santa Coleta.—Garcés (1776), Diary, 424, 1900.

Santa Cruz (Holy Cross). The twelfth Franciscan mission established in California. The proposed site was personally examined by Fr. Lasuen, who found the natives friendly and ready to help. Supplies and native assistants were sent from the neighboring missions, especially Santa Clara, and the mission was formally founded Sept. 25, 1791, at the place where is now situated the town of Santa Cruz, Santa Clara co. At the end of the year there were 84 neophytes. In 1792 there were 224, and the highest number, 523, was reached in 1796. In 1800 there were 492. At this time the mission had 2,354 head of cattle and horses, and 2,083 of small stock, while the crop for the year amounted to 4,300 bushels. The church, 30 by 112 ft and 25 ft high, with stone front, was completed and dedicated in 1794. In 1797 a number of colonists arrived from Mexico and settled just across the river Lorenzo from the mission. This settlement caused the missionaries much trouble, and seems to have demoralized the Indians. In 1798 the padre in charge was much discouraged with the outlook and reported that 138 neophytes had deserted. He protested against the settlement, but without effect. The number of neophytes remained about the same for the next 20 years, being 507 in 1810, and 461 in 1820. The livestock increased and the crops continued good. In 1812 one of the fathers was murdered by some of the neophytes, who plead in defense that he was excessively cruel, had flogged two of them to death, and was inventing further instruments of torture. In 1818 and 1819 there was considerable friction between the mission fathers and the authorities at Brancifort, all but three of the neophytes leaving the mission at one time for fear of attack. After 1820 the mission continued prosperous, but the population decreased, there being 320 neophytes in 1830, and about 250 in 1834. The total number of natives baptized up to that time was 2,216, of whom 939 were children. Within 4 years after its secularization most of the property had disappeared. In 1839 there were 70 Indians reported at the mission, with perhaps as many more scattered in the district. In 1840 a number of buildings were destroyed and the church was injured by an earthquake. After 1842 the mission was regarded as a part of Brancifort; the buildings had then entirely disappeared. The Indians in the neighborhood of the mission belong to the Costanoan linguistic family. The mission had neophytes from the following villages, all in the present county of Santa Cruz (Taylor, Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860): Achilla, Aestaca, Agtiam, Apil, Aulintac, Chalumü, Chanach, Chicutae, Choromi, Coot, Hauzaurni, Hottrochtac, Huachi, Hualquilme, Huocom, Locobo, Luchasmi, Mallin, Nohioalli, Ochoyos, Onbi, Osacalis (Souquel), Payanmin, Sachuen, Sagin, Shiuguermi, Shoremee, Sio Cotchmin, Tejey, Tomoy, Turami, Utalliam, Wallanmi, Yeunaba, Yeunata, Yeunator. (A. B. L.)

Santa Cruz. A former Tewa pueblo, situated E. of the Rio Grande, 30 m. N. W. of Santa Fé, at the site of the present town of the same name. It was abandoned probably about the time of the Pueblo revolt of 1680-92, but was refounded with 29 families in 1706 and a mission established. The place gradually became civilized, and is now a "Mexican" town.

La Cañada.—Prince, Hist. N. Mex., 319, 1883 (or Santa Cruz). Santa Cruz de la Cañada.—Villa-Señor, Teatro Am., pt 2, 413, 1748. Santa María de Grado.—Cuervo (1706) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 228, 1889 (mission name from 1706); Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 5, 1776.

Santa Cruz. A settlement, chiefly of Lipan, at which a Spanish mission was established in 1762; situated in the valley of San José, halfway between San Sabá and the Rio Grande, in Texas.

San Lorenzo de la Santa Cruz.—Arricivita quoted by Buschmann, Spüren d. aztek. Spr., 307, 1859.

Santa Cruz. A former Opatá pueblo of Sonora, Mexico, the inhabitants of which were called Contla (Orozco y Berra, Geog., 344, 1864). Probably situated on the Rio Sonora, about lat. 30°.

Santa Cruz. One of the Apalachee towns of Florida, mentioned in the letter of Apalachee chiefs to Charles II, King of Spain, in 1688.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., 1, 76, 1884.

Santa Cruz de Mayo. A settlement of the Mayo on the W. bank of Rio Mayo, about 12 m. above its mouth, S. W. Sonora, Mexico.

Santa Cruz de Mayo.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 356, 1864. S. Cruz.—Kino, map (1702), in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 1726.

Santa Eulalia. A former rancharia, probably of the Sobaipuri, visited by Father Kino in 1700. Situated slightly N. W. of Busanic, immediately S. of the present Arizona-Sonora boundary.

Santa Tulalia.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., 1, 300, 1759 (misprint). Sta Eulalia.—Early writer quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 359, 1889. St. Eulalia.—Kino, map (1701), in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 360, 1889.

Santa Fé (Holy Faith). A former Cora pueblo and seat of a mission with San Diego and San Juan Bautista as its visitas. Situated near the N. bank of the Rio Grande de Santiago, lon. 104° 40', Jalisco, Mexico.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 280, 1864.

Santa Fé.—Romans, Fla., 280, 1775. Santa-feo-talofa.—Bell in Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 306, 1822.

Santa Gertrudis (Saint Gertrude). A mission founded in 1751 by Father Consag on the E. side of Lower California, lat. 27°

58'. The Indians, who spoke a Cochimi dialect, numbered about 1,000 in 1767. (See Hervas, Saggio, 79-80, 1787; Taylor in Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app., 50, 1869.)

Santa Gertrudes.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., II, 16, map, 1902.

Santa Inés (Saint Agnes). The nineteenth Franciscan mission established in California; founded Sept. 17, 1804, at a place called by the natives Alajulapu, about 25 m. from Santa Barbara, and nearly as far from Purísima. A large number of neophytes from Santa Barbara and Purísima attended the opening ceremony, and many remained at the new mission. On the same day 27 children were baptized. By the end of the first year there were 225 neophytes, in 1810 there were 628, while the highest number, 768, was reached in 1816. In material things the mission prospered, having 7,720 head of large stock in 1820, 5,100 of small stock, and an average annual crop for the preceding decade of 4,340 bushels. The stock increased and the crops continued good for another decade, between 1822 and 1827 supplies to the value of $10,767 being furnished the presidio at Santa Barbara. The first church was seriously injured by an earthquake in 1812, and a new one of adobe lined with brick, which still stands, was completed in 1817. In 1824 there was a revolt of the neophytes at Santa Inés, and a conflict between them and the soldiers, a large part of the mission buildings being burned, and the hostile Indians fleeing, apparently to Purísima (q. v.). In 1830 there were 408 neophytes, but the number decreased to 344 in 1834. Up to that time 1,323 natives had been baptized, of whom 757 were children. In 1840 there were still about 300 Indians in the neighborhood, and the affairs of the mission were generally prosperous. In 1844 Santa Inés was reported to have had 264 neophytes, with sufficient resources for their support. After this the property of the mission rapidly declined, and in 1846 the land was sold for $7,000, but the building and church property remained in the charge of the padre. In 1844 an ecclesiastical college was opened at Santa Inés, but it was abandoned 6 years later. The Indians in the neighborhood of the mission belonged to the Chtumashan (q. v.) linguistic family, to which most of its neophytes probably belonged. Many came from the Channel islands, especially Santa Rosa. Some of the neophytes were skilled workers in silver and carved leather, and their work and productions were and still are highly prized for their excellence and artistic merit. (A. B. L.)

Santa Inés. A reservation of unsurveyed, unpatented land, occupied by 52 Mission Indians in 1909; situated 240 m. from Mission Tule River agency, in Santa Barbara co., not far from the old Santa Inés mission, s. Cal. These Indians were located on lands belonging to the Catholic Church and also what is known as the college grants. Legal steps were taken several years ago to obtain for the use of these Indians the lands on which they had resided, and which they had cultivated for many years, but the question has not yet been determined.

Santa Ynez.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1902, 175, 1903.

Santa Isabel. A Diegueño village about 50 m. n. e. of San Diego, s. Cal. Pop. 125 in 1873. The name is now given to a reservation of 29,845 acres of waterless, mountainous stock land, with 284 inhabitants.

Santa Isabel. A group of Mohave rancherias, visited and so named by Fray Francisco Garcés in 1776; situated at or in the vicinity of the present Needles, s. e. Cal.—Garcés, Diary (1776), 234, 1900.

Santa Isabel. Mentioned as the last Yuma rancheria on the s. side of the Rio Gila; visited by Father Kino in Nov. 1701.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 497, 1884.

Santa Lucia. A former visitation town of San Ignacio de Kadakaman mission, situated 10 leagues distant from it, about lat. 28°, Lower California. Its inhabitants were Cochimi. See Venegas, Hist. Cal., i, 421; ii, 198, 1759.

Santa Lucia de Acuera. A Spanish mission of the 17th century, established at the Timucuan town of Acuera, on the e. coast of Florida, s. of Cape Cañaveral. It was probably destroyed, with the other Timucuan missions, in the invasion of the hostile Creeks and Carolina troops about 1705. Distinct from Acquera. (J. M.)

Santa Margarita. A name applied by Fray Francisco Garcés (Diary, 411, 1900) in 1776 to a rancheria, probably of the Walapai, near the Cerbat mts. of w. Arizona.

Santa Margarita. Given by Bancroft (Nat. Races, i, 460, 1874) as a Luiseno village of California, but it perhaps belonged to the Shoshonean Kawia.

Santa María (Saint Mary). A settlement, probably of a people speaking a Cochimi dialect, situated 5 leagues n. of the mission of Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe, above lat. 27°, Lower California. In 1745 it was a visita of the mission mentioned. See Venegas, Hist. Cal., ii, 198, 1759.

Santa María de los Dolores (Saint Mary of the Sorrows). A former pueblo of the Jova, with 180 inhabitants in 1730; situated in e. Sonora, Mexico, near Rio Viejo, a tributary of the Yaqui. It formed a visita of the mission of Teopari prior to the abandonment of that pueblo on account of Apache depredations in the latter part of the 18th century.

Dolores.—Rivera (1730) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 514, 1884. Los Dolores.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 345, 1864. Santa María de los Dolores.—Rivera (1730) cited by Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 510, 1892.

Santa María de Palaxy. A settlement at the mouth of Yellow r., Santa Rosa co., w. Fla., probably one of the villages into which the remnant of the Apalachee was gathered after 1718.

Santa María Magdalena. A mission founded by Father Linck's two associates, Arnes and Diez, at Cabujakaamang, in lat. 30° or 31°, Lower California. It was the last Jesuit mission established in that territory. For reference to its language, see Buschmann, Spuren, 472, 1858, and consult also Venegas, Hist. Cal., ii, 199, 1759.

Cabujakaamang.—Clavijero, Hist. Baja Cal., 108, 1852. Cabujakaamang.—Clavigero, Storia della Cal., ii, 181, 1789. Cabujakamang.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 90, 1855. Santa María.—Taylor quoted by Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app., 50, 1869. Santa María de los Angeles de Kabu Juacama.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Jan. 24, 1862. St. Mary's.—Shea, op. cit.

Santa María Magdalena. A former Teomoris pueblo in Chinipas valley, w. Chihuahua, Mexico; pop. 585 in 1678.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 324, 1864.

Santa Martha.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., ii, 198, 1759.

Santa Monica. A visita of San Ignacio de Kadakaman mission, situated 7 leagues from it, about lat. 28°, Lower California, in 1745.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., ii, 198, 1759.

Santan (corruption of Span. Santa Ana). A Pima settlement on the n. bank of Rio Gila, opposite the Pima agency, s. Ariz. Ao'pohiam.—Russell in 26th Rep. B. A. E., 23, 1908 (native name, of unknown meaning).

Santa Nynfa. A visita of San Ignacio de Kadakaman mission, situated 5 leagues from it, about lat. 28°, Lower California, in 1745.

Santa Nympha.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., i, 421, 1759. Santa Nynfa.—Ibid., ii, 198, 1759.

Santa Olalla. A "laguna," or perhaps more strictly a flat subject to inundation, which in the 18th century contained some Yuma rancherias; situated in n. Lower California, lat. 32° 33', somewhat above the entrance of New r. to the main floodplain of the Rio Colorado, 6 to 10 m. w. of the latter and about 8 leagues w. s. w. of the mouth of the Gila. It was notable, at the time named, as the end of the Yuma and the beginning of the Cajuenche settlements. The Comeya also descended "to this land to eat calabashes and other fruits of the river." See Coues, Garcés Diary (1775-6), 165 et seq., 1900.

Santa Eulalia.—Cones, op. cit., 165. Santa Olalla.—Ibid. Santa Olaya.—Ibid., passim. St. Eulalie.—Ibid.

Santa Rita (Holy Rite). The Spanish name of what was probably an ancient settlement of the Tepecano, or of a related tribe, but occupied since early in the 18th century by Tlaxcaltec introduced by the Spaniards for defense against the "Chichimecs"; situated about 15 m. s. e. of Bolaños, in Jalisco, Mexico.—Hrdlička in Am. Anthr., v, 425, 1903.

Santa Rosa (Saint Rose). A Papago village s. of the Rio Gila and w. of Tucson, Ariz. It contained 120 inhabitants in 1858, 160 families under Chief Anastasio in 1865, and about 400 people in 1869 (see Ind. Aff. Reps. for dates given, also Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 19, 1863; Browne, Apache Country, 291, 1869). The adjacent mountain of Santa Rosa is a sacred place in Pima and Papago mythology.

Santa Rosa. A name applied by Fray Francisco Garcés, in 1771, to a group of Quigyuma ("Jalliquamay") rancherias on the e. side of the lower Rio Colorado, about lat. 32° 18', in n. w. Sonora, Mexico. When he revisited the place in 1775 the settlements were abandoned, the Quigyuma having moved to the w. side of the river in Lower California.—Garcés, Diary (1775), 182, 1900.

Santa Rosa. A former Cora pueblo and a visita of the mission of Peyotan, near the w. bank of the Rio San Pedro, lat. 22° 45', Jalisco, Mexico (Orozco y Berra, Geog., 280, 1864). The place now consists of a few houses occupied by Mexicans.

Santa Rosa. A small Kawia settlement on a reservation of unsurveyed, unpatented land under the San Jacinto agency, in Riverside co., s. Cal. The reservation contained 77 inhabitants in 1909.

Santa Rosa. A Cora settlement on the upper waters of the Rio Jesus María, in the n. part of the territory of Tepic, Mexico.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., II, 16, map, 1902.

Santa Rosalia Mulege. A former Indian settlement and Spanish mission on the e. shore of Lower California, half a league from Mulege r., lat. 26° 55'. The mission was founded in 1705 by Padre Juan M. Basualda, and in 1745, according to Venegas (Hist. Cal., II, 197–198, 1759), had two visitas, Santísima Trinidad and San Marcos. The old settlement was abandoned in 1815 by the few remaining inhabitants on account of the establishment there of a depot for exiles from Sonora and Sinaloa. See Venegas, Hist. Cal., I, 381; II, 197, 1759.

Carmaño Galezá.—Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 186, 1857 (after early document). Molejé.—Duflot de Mofras, Expl., I, 219, 228, 238, 1844. Mulege.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., I, 335, 1759. Santa Rosalia de Moleje.—Taylor in Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app., 49, 1869. S. Rosalia di Mulegè.—Clavigero, Storia della Cal., II, 186, 1789.

Santa Teresa. The northernmost Cora pueblo and formerly the seat of a mission; situated in the Sierra de Nayarit, in the n. part of the territory of Tepic, Mexico. Quemalási.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., I, 489, 1902 (native name, after a mythical personage). Santa Teresa.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 280, 1864.

Santa Ynés. See Santa Inés.

Santee (Isaṇyati, from isañ 'knife,' contraction of isañta-mde 'knife lake,' Dakota name for Mille Lacs, and ati, 'to pitch tents at'). An eastern division of the Dakota, comprising the Mdewakanton and Wahpekute, sometimes also the Sisseton and Wahpeton. Hennepin (1680), who probably included only the Mdewakanton, says (Descr. La., Shea's trans., 203, 1880): "In the neighborhood of L. Buade are many other lakes, whence issue several rivers, on the banks of which live the Issati, Nadouessans, Tinthonha (which means prairie-men), Ouadebathon River People, Chongaskethon Dog, or Wolf tribe (for chonga among these nations means dog or wolf), and other tribes, all which we comprise under the name Nadouessiou [Sioux]." In Le Sueur's list (1700) the Issati are omitted and the Mdewakanton (written Mendeoucantons) inserted, for the first time. The name Santee was applied by the Missouri River Dakota to all those of the group living on Mississippi and lower Minnesota rs., the Mdewakanton, Wahpekute, Wahpeton, and Sisseton. Ramsey (Rep. Ind. Aff. for 1849, 74, 1850) and Riggs limit the use of the term to designate the Mdewakanton. McGee (15th Rep. B. A. E., 160, 1897) includes only the Wahpekute, which has been the usual application of the term since 1862, when the two tribes were gathered on the Santee res. in Knox co., Neb. Reyata is mentioned as a band and Ptansinta as a village of the Santee.

The tribes forming this group joined under the collective name in the following treaties with the United States: Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 15, 1830; St. Louis, Mo., Oct. 13, 1830; Bellevue, Neb., Oct. 15, 1836; Washington, D. C., Feb. 19, 1867; Fort Laramie, Wyo., Apr. 29, 1868. See Dakota, and the Santee divisions above given.

Santee. A tribe, probably Siouan, formerly residing on middle Santee r., S. C., where Lawson in 1700 found their plantations extending for many miles. One of their villages was called Hickerau. While friendly to the white people, they were at war with the coast tribes. According to Rivers (Hist. S. C., 94, 1874), they had two villages with 43 warriors in 1715, and were then settled 70 m. n. of Charleston. Bartram (Trav., 54, 1791) tells us that in 1715 they sided with the Yamasee against the British, and that they were attacked and reduced by the Creeks, who were allies of the British. It appears from South Carolina colonial documents that the Santee and Congeree were cut off by the "Itwans and Cossaboys," coast tribes in the English interest, and the prisoners sold as slaves in the West Indies in 1716. Those that escaped were probably incorporated with the Catawba. Lawson states that their chief was an absolute ruler with power of life and death over his tribe, an instance of despotism very rare among Indians. Their distinguished dead were buried on the tops of mounds, built low or high according to the rank of the deceased, with ridge roofs supported by poles over the graves to shelter them from the weather. On these poles were hung rattles, feathers, and other offerings from the relatives of the deceased. The corpse of an ordinary person was carefully dressed, wrapped in bark, and exposed on a platform for several days, during which time one of his nearest kinsmen, with face blackened in token of grief, stood guard near the spot and chanted a mournful eulogy of the dead. The ground around the platform was kept carefully swept, and all the dead man's belongings—gun, bow, and feather robes—were placed near by. As soon as the flesh had softened it was stripped from the bones and burned, and the bones themselves were cleaned, the skull being wrapped separately in a cloth woven of opossum hair. The bones were then put into a box, from which they were taken out annually to be again cleaned and oiled. In this way some families had in their possession the bones of their ancestors for several generations. Places where warriors had been killed were sometimes distinguished by piles of stones or sticks, to which every passing Indian added another. After the manner of the Cherokee and other Southern tribes the Santee kept corn in storehouses raised on posts and plastered with clay. They made beautiful feather robes and wove cloth and sashes of hair. Consult Lawson, Hist. Carolina, repr. 1860; Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, 80, 1894. (J. M.)

Santee.—Lawson (1700), Hist. Carolina, 34, 1860. Seratees.—Mills, Stat. S. C., 735, 1826. Seratee.—Lawson (1700), op. cit., 45. Zantees.—Howe in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, IV, 155, 1854.

San Teodoro (Saint Theodore). A name applied by Mézières, in 1778, to one of two Tawehash villages visited by him on upper Red r., Texas.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 649, 663, 1886.

Santiago (Saint James). A Tigua pueblo in New Mexico in 1626 (Zárate-Salmerón, ca. 1629, cited by Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 600, 1882). According to Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 227, 1892) it was situated about 5½ m. above Bernalillo, on the Mesa del Cangelon.

Santiam. A Kalapooian tribe formerly residing on the river of the same name, an E. tributary of the Willamette, in Oregon. They are now on Grande Ronde res., where they numbered 23 in 1906. In 1909 the number officially reported was only 5, the remainder evidently having received patents for their lands and become citizens. In 1877 Gatschet was able to learn of 4 bands, Chamifu, Chanchampénau, Chanchantu, and Chantkaip, which had formerly existed in the tribe. Ahápam.—Gatschet, Atfalati MS., B. A. E., 1877 (Atfalati name). Santains.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 469, 1865. Santainas.—Taylor in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 40th Cong., spec. sess., 27, 1867. Santiam.—Dayton treaty, 1855, in U. S. Ind. Santísima Trinidad (Most Holy Trinity). A Cochimi village and visita of Santa Rosalia Mulege mission in 1745, situated 6 leagues S. SE. therefrom, lat. 26° 55', Lower California.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., II, 198, 1759.

Santísimo Nombre de María (Most Holy Name of Mary). A Franciscan mission founded among the Caddo by Padre Francisco de Jesus María in 1690, on Arcangel San Miguel r. (the Rio Neches), a few miles N.E. of the mission of San Francisco de los Tejas, in the present Texas. After San Francisco had been abandoned this mission was not heard of again.—Austin in Tex. Hist. Asso. Quar., VIII, 281, 1905.

Santo Domingo (Saint Dominic, also Holy Sabbath). A Keresan pueblo on the E. bank of the Rio Grande, about 18 m. above Bernalillo, N. central N. Mex. The earliest traditions of the pueblo locate it at the Potrero de la Cañada Quemada, whence the inhabitants in prehistoric times removed successively to two villages, each named Gipuy (q. v.), the later one of which they occupied when visited by Oñate in 1598. The earlier Gipuy stood on the banks of the Arroyo de Galisteo, more than a mile E. of the present station of Thornton, but was partially destroyed by a rise of that dangerous torrent in one night, the inhabitants being compelled to move farther westward, where the second Gipuy was built. This pueblo, also destroyed by a flood, was succeeded by Huashpatzena, on the Rio Grande, which suffered the fate of its predecessors. The present Santo Domingo, the aboriginal name of which is Kiua, has had three disasters from flood since its establishment 200 years ago, the latest occurring in 1886 when both churches were destroyed. The first Gipuy is the only pueblo of the Santo Domingo Indians E. of the Rio Grande of which any trace remains. At the time of Oñate's visit in 1598 Santo Domingo was chosen as the "monastery of the advocacy of Nuestra Señora de la Asunción" (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 254, 1871). It also became the seat of a mission early in the 17th century, and after 1782 had San Felipe and Cochiti as its visitas. According to Bandelier 18 clans are represented in this pueblo. Pop. 819 in 1910. Consult Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 260, 1890; IV, 184 et seq., 1892. See also Keresan Family, Pueblos. (F. W. H.)

Santos Angeles (Holy Angels). Mentioned as a Pima pueblo of Sonora, Mexico, by Orozco y Berra (Geog., 347, 1864). Definite locality unknown.

Santotin. A division of the Tenan-kutchin, occupying the territory about a lake on White r., Alaska, and westward, extending down Tanana r. to a point nearly opposite the head of Forty Mile cr. Mantotin.—Allen, Rep. on Alaska, 137, 1887. Santo-tin.—Dawson in Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., n. s., III, 203B, 1889.

Santo Tomás (Saint Thomas). A Dominican mission established in 1790 in the N. part of Lower California, lat. 31° 40', near Todos Santos bay. Its inhabitants, sometimes called San Tomaseños, were visited in Apr. 1867 by Dr Wm. M. Gabb, who found their language to be a dialect of Diegueño or Comeya, closely related to Htaam and Kiliwi.

Santo Tomas.—Taylor in Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app., 51, 1869.

Santo Tomás. A settlement of the Jova on the upper waters of Papigochic r., 4 m. S. of Metachic, in W. Chihuahua, Mexico.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 345, 1864.

Santsukhdhin ('campers in the highland grove'). One of the three larger divisions of the Osage, commonly known as the Arkansas band. Originally a part of the Grand Osage, or Pahatsi, living successively on Sac r., and on Little Osage r. in Vernon co., Mo., they were induced by the trader Choteau, about 1802, to secede from the main body under White Hair and remove to the Arkansas r., Manuel Lisa, another trader, having obtained a monopoly of the Missouri traffic from the Spanish authorities. At the time named Clermont and Casesagra were their principal men. In 1810 their village was on the Verdigris branch of the Arkansas, 60 m. above its mouth, in the present Oklahoma; in 1820 they were at the mouth of the river, then numbering 600. When met by De Smet in 1850 their number was reported at 700.

Arkansa band.—McGee in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 162, 1897. Arkansaw band.—Lewis and Clark Exped., I, 8, 1814. Arkansaw Osages.—Pike, Trav., 430, 1811. Big Track.—Schermmerhorn (1812) in Mass. E., 1883 (their ancient village: 'point of a timbered highland'). san-tsu'-yá.—McGee, after Dorsey, in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 162, 1897. Sanze-Ougrin.—De Smet, loc. cit.

Sanukh (Sünux). A former Tonkawa clan or band (Gatschet, Tonkawe MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884). Possibly the Sana or Zana of mission archives.

Sanup. See Sannup.

San Xavier del Bac (the Jesuit mission name, combined with the Piman bak, vak, viaki, its native designation, signifying 'house,' 'adobe house,' also 'ruined house,' 'ruin': probably given because of the remains of ancient adobe structures in the vicinity). A former important Sobai-puri rancheria on Rio Santa Cruz, 9 m. s. of Tucson, Ariz., in the N. E. corner of what is now the Papago res. It was first visited and the Saint name applied in 1692 by Father Kino, a celebrated Jesuit, who next visited it perhaps in 1694, again in 1697 (at which date it numbered 830 persons in 176 houses), and many times thereafter. In 1700 he founded a church, built of light porous stone, the construction of which was possibly begun in the previous year. In its earlier years the mission flourished under the Jesuits, of whom 22 served San Xavier until 1767, when they were succeeded by Franciscans. In 1751-53, during a revolt of the Pima, the mission was plundered and abandoned, but was reoccupied two years later under the protection of the presidio of Tubac. Between 1760 and 1764 it contained 400 inhabitants—less than half its population 60 years before—and these had dwindled to 270 by 1772. When Fray Francisco Garcés, its first Franciscan missionary, took charge in 1768 he found the mission in a neglected state, but it again began to flourish on the establishment of the presidio of Tucson in 1776. In 1783 the erection of a new church of plastered brick, commodious and of architectural merit, was begun by Padre Baltasar Cavillo near the site of that built by Kino, and was brought to its present state of completeness by Padre Narciso Gutierrez in 1797—a date still legible over the portal. The remains of these priests are buried in the church. In 1810 San Xavier again began to decline, and came to an end as an independent mission with the expulsion of the Franciscans on the fall of the Colonial government, Dec. 2, 1827, from which time it struggled along as a visita of Magdalena, Sonora, until 1859, when Arizona was segregated ecclesiastically from the diocese of Santa Fé, N. Mex. In 1852 Bartlett described it as "truly a miserable place, consisting of from 80 to 100 huts, or wigwams, made of mud or straw," but "in the midst of these hovels stands the most beautiful church in the State of Sonora." In 1865 the population was 80 Papago families. In the preceding year a school was established at San Xavier by the Catholic Church; this contained 125 day pupils in 1908. In 1873 a Government school was begun, but was closed in 1876 when the Papago were consolidated under the Pima agency. It is now a scattered but large and flourishing Papago settlement. There are numerous adobe houses, and the Indians are advancing toward civilization. The people are under the supervision of a white farmer, who acts as subagent. A number of the San Xavier Papago within recent years have settled in the outskirts of Tucson. Consult Bartlett, Pers. Narr., II, 185, 1854; Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1763), 1863; Salpointe, Brief Sketch, 1880; Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 1889; Coues, Garcés Diary, 1900; Curtis, N. Am. Ind., II, 1908. (F. W. H.)

Sanyakoan. A Tlingit tribe formerly inhabiting a town named Gash, at C. Fox, Alaska, and often confused with the neighboring Tongas. Pop. 177 in 1839. In the census of 1880 they are erroneously placed on Prince of Wales id., and are given a population of 100. Their social divisions are Nehadi and Tekoedi. (J. R. S.)

Cape Fox Indians.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859. Lugh-se-le.—Ibid. Lukhsalee.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 37, 1884 (after a Hudson's Bay Co. census of 1839). Sanakhanakoe.—Veniaminoff, Zapiski, II, pt. Saone (probably the same as Sanona). A division of the Teton Sioux, comprising the Sans Arcs, Sihasapa, Oohenonpa, and sometimes the Hunkpapa, first mentioned by Lewis and Clark, and under the form Souon-Teton in Clark's MS., where they are called "people of the prairie" and made one of the 12 tribes of the Dakota, while the Souon are another. Riggs informed Dorsey that the name "Sanoniwicasa" was used as a nickname, and wrote (Word Carrier, 14, June-July, 1889) that the Brulés and Oglala formerly applied it to the Sans Arcs, Miniconjou, and Hunkpapa. Lewis and Clark did not include the Miniconjou, but included the rest of the Teton found along Missouri r. except the Brulés and Oglala, and estimated them at 300 men, or 900 souls—three-tenths of the whole. There was a Sangona, or Sahown, band of the Hunkpapa, with which they have been confused (see Coues in Lewis and Clark Exped., i, 101, note, 1897). The Hunkpapa were probably not counted as Saone proper by Lewis, for in his table (Discov., 34, 1806) he distinguishes from these the Saone Hunkpapa. The Saone, under the name Sioune, joined the Oglala in the treaty with the United States at the mouth of Teton r., S. Dak., July 5, 1825. As the "Siounes of the Fire-hearts band" are mentioned and the Hunkpapa are not, it is probable the latter were not included under the term Sioune.

Sapohanikan (Delaware: Auwisopodkänichan, 'over against the pipe-making place,' i. e., Hoboken, a remnant of the native name Hopodkänhäking, 'at the tobacco-pipe land'). Hoboken was the outlet for peltries collected in the interior by the Indians, who took them in their canoes directly across the river and landed with them in a cove north of "Sapokanichan Point," near the present Gansevoort st., New York city. The adjoining land was not the site of an Indian village. Van Twiller purchased a tract in the vicinity and established on it a tobacco plantation, with buildings inclosed in a stockade, and called his Dutch settlement "Sapokanikan." See Rутtenber, Ind. Geog. Names, 17, 1906.

Saponi. One of the eastern Siouan tribes, formerly living in North Carolina and Virginia, but now extinct. The tribal name was occasionally applied to the whole group of Ft Christanna tribes, also occasionally included under Tutelo. That this tribe belonged to the Siouan stock has been placed beyond doubt by the investigations of Hale and Mooney. Their language appears to have been the same as the Tutelo to the extent that the people of the two tribes could readily understand each other. Mooney has shown that the few Saponi words recorded are Siouan.

Lederer mentions a war in which the Saponi seem to have been engaged with the Virginia settlers as early as 1654-56, the time of the attack by the Cherokee, probably in alliance with them. The first positive notice is by Lederer (1670), who informs us that he stopped a few days at Sapon, a town of the Tutelo confederacy, situated on a tributary of the upper Roanoke. This village was apparently on Otter r., s. w. of Lynchburg, Va. Pintahae is mentioned also as another of their villages near by. It is evident that the Saponi and Tutelo were living at that time in close and apparently confederated relation. In 1671 they were visited by Thomas Batts and others accompanied by two Indian guides. After traveling nearly due w. from the mouth of the Appomattox about 140 m., they came to Sapon, or Saponys, town. Having been harassed by the Iroquois in this locality, the Saponi and Tutelo at a later date removed to the junction of Staunton and Dan rs., where they settled near the Occaneechi, each tribe occupying an island in the Roanoke in what is now Mecklenburg co., Va. Lawson, who visited these Indians in 1701, found them dwelling on Yadkin r., N. C., near the present site of Salisbury, having removed to the s. to escape the attacks of their enemies. Byrd (1729) remarks: "They dwelt formerly not far below the mountains, upon Yadkin r., about 200 miles west and by south from the falls of Roanoak. But about 25 years ago they took refuge in Virginia, being no longer in condition to make head not only against the northern Indians, who are their implacable enemies, but also against most of those to the south. All the nations round about, bearing in mind the havoc these Indians used formerly to make among their ancestors in the insolence of their power, did at length avenge it home upon them, and made them glad to apply to this Government for protection."

Soon after Lawson's visit in 1701 the Saponi and Tutelo left their villages on the Yadkin and moved in toward the settlements, being joined on the way by the Occaneechi and their allied tribes. Together they crossed the Roanoke, evidently before the Tuscarora war of 1711, and made a new settlement, called Sapona Town, a short distance e. of that river and 15 m. w. of the present Windsor, Bertie co., N. C. Soon after this they and other allied tribes were located by Gov. Spotswood near Ft Christanna, 10 m. n. of Roanoke r., about the present Gholsonville, Brunswick co., Va. The name of Sappony cr., in Dinwiddie co., dating back at least to 1733, indicates that they sometimes extended their excursions n. of Nottoway r. Their abode here was not one of quiet, as they were at war with neighboring tribes or their old enemies, the Iroquois. By the treaty at Albany (1722) peace was declared between the northern Indians and the Virginia and Carolina tribes, the Blue Ridge and the Potomac being the boundary line. Probably about 1740 the Saponi and Tutelo went n., stopping for a time at Shamokin, in Pennsylvania, about the site of Sunbury, where they and other Indians were visited by the missionary David Brainard in 1745. In 1753 the Cayuga formally adopted the Saponi and Tutelo, who thus became a part of the Six Nations, though all had not then removed to New York. In 1765 the Saponi are mentioned as having 30 warriors living at Tioga, about Sayre, Pa., and other villages on the northern branches of the Susquehanna. A part remained here until 1778, but in 1771 the principal portion had their village in the territory of the Cayuga, about 2 m. s. of what is now Ithaca, N. Y. When the Tutelo fled to Canada, soon after 1779, they parted with the Saponi (Hale was informed by the last of the Tutelo) at Niagara, but what became of them afterward is not known. It appears, however, from a treaty made with the Cayuga at Albany in 1780 that a remnant was still living with this tribe on Seneca r. in Seneca co., N. Y., after which they disappear from history. Sapponet. A former village connected with San Carlos mission, Cal., and said to have been Esselen.

Sepponet.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Saptui (Saph'-tu-u'-i). A former Chumashan village in the interior of Ventura co., Cal., at a place called El Conejo.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Saquerisera. See Sequareesere.

Saracachi. A Eudeve pueblo of Sonora, Mexico, with 31 inhabitants in 1730; situated near the present Cucurpe. The comisaria of Saracachi y Dolores, which contained 401 inhabitants in 1900, is the outgrowth of the former pueblo.

Sacarachi.—Rivera (1730) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 513, 1884. Saracachi.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 344, 1864.

Saracuam. One of the tribes enumerated by Massanet (Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, MS.) as on the road from Coahuila to the Texas country. The affinities of the tribe are uncertain.

Saraise. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Sarapinagh. A tribe or division living in 1608 on Nanticoke r., on the eastern shore of Maryland. It is probable that they were a part of the Nanticoke tribe.

Sarapinagh.—Simons in Smith (1629), Va., I, 175, repr. 1819. Soraphanigh.—Purchas, Pilgrimes, IV, 1713, 1626.

Sarasota. Mentioned by Armistead (H. R. Doc. 247, 27th Cong., 2d sess., 14, 1842) as a Seminole settlement in Florida in 1841; pop. 30 or 40. Doubtless situated at or near the site of the present town of that name in Manatee co.

Saratoga ('the place where ashes or alkaline substances float.'—Hewitt). According to Macauley, the name of a Mohawk band (village?) formerly occupying the w. bank of the Hudson, about Saratoga and Stillwater, in Saratoga co., N. Y.

Oh-sa-ra-kas.—Macauley, N. Y., II, 174, 1829. Saratogas.—Bollan (1748) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., VI, 135, 1800.

Saratoga. A kind of trunk. Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 551, 1877) says: "The enormous trunks carried by fashionable ladies to Saratoga Springs have obtained for them the specific name of 'Saratoga trunks,' or Saratogas." From the place-name Saratoga (q. v.), a word of Iroquois origin. Another term from this region is "Saratoga chips"—potatoes sliced thin and fried crisp in hot fat—so-called because they were first made popular in the Saratoga hotels. (A. F. C.)

Sarauahi. Apparently the name of two villages in N. E. Florida in the 16th century. One marked on the De Bry map of 1591 as Sarrauahi (river) is described by Laudonnière in 1564 as on an inlet N. of St John r., and about 2 leagues from the French Ft Caroline on the s. bank of the river, near its mouth. This probably belonged to the Saturiba tribe. The other, probably Calanay of the De Bry map, is described by Fontaneda, about 1575, as 50 or 60 leagues up St John r. and subject to Utina, the Timucua chief. Laudonnière also notes "Calany" as subject to Utina. The printed synonym forms for both are interchangeable. (J. M.)

Asavay.—Fontaneda (ca. 1575) in Ternaux-Compans, Voy., XX, 35, 1841 (middle St John r.; misprint for Zaravay in same passage of Smith trans.). Calanay.—De Bry, map (1591), in Le Moyne Narr., Appleton trans., 1857 (middle St John r.; identical?). Calanio.—Barcia, Ensayo, 48, 1723 (identical?). Calany.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 243, 1869 (the Calanay of De Bry map, and noted as subject to Utina). Saranay.—Fontaneda (ca. 1575) in French, Hist. Coll. La., 2d s., II, 264, 1875 (middle St John r.). Sarauahi.—Laudonnière (1564) quoted by Shipp, De Soto and Fla., 519, 1881 (N. of St John r.). Saraurahi.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 315, 1869 (N. of St John r.; misprint second r for v). Saravay.—Fontaneda Memoir (ca. 1575), Smith trans., 25, 1854 (mentioned as on middle St John and subject to Utina, chief of the Timucua). Sarrauahi.—De Bry, map (1591), in Le Moyne Narr., Appleton trans., 1875 (river short distance N. of St John r.). Serranay.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Sardlok. An Eskimo village on the w. coast of Greenland, lat. 64° 20'.—Nansen, Eskimo Life, 166, 1894.

Sarfalik ('place of guillemots'). An Ita Eskimo village near Smith sd., N. Greenland.—Heilprin, Peary Relief Exped., 104, 1893.

Serwädling.—Stein in Petermanns Mitt., 198, 1902. Sovernik.—Kane, Arct. Explor., II, 125, 1856.

Sargarría. Mentioned as a New Mexico mission in 1742.—Mendoza et al. (1742-3) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 244, 1889.

Sargentaruka. A former village of the Rumsen division of the Costanoan family, 21 m. E. of Carmelo r., Cal. It is said to have been populous.

Sargenta rucas.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860. Sargentarukas.—Ibid. Sirkhintaruk.—Kroeber, Costanoan MS., Univ. Cal., 1902 (Sirkhinta, name of place with locative ending -ta; ruk, 'houses,' 'village': said to have been the same as Kakontaruk, or Kakonkaruk, at Pt Sur, s. of Monterey).

Saric. A rancheria, probably of the Papago, visited by Kino in 1694; the seat of a mission from about 1700 (Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 357, 1889). Situated on the w. bank of Rio Altar, in N. Sonora, Mexico.

Nuestra Señora de los Dolores del Saric.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 347, 1864. Oacpuaguigua.—Quijano (1757) in Doc. Hist. Sarkak. A Danish Eskimo village on the Waigat, N. Greenland.—Wyckoff in Scribner's Mag., XXVIII, 450, 1900.

Sarkarmiut. A ruined Angmagsalingmiut village on the E. coast of Greenland, lat. 66° 19'.—Meddelelser om Grönland, XXVII, map, 1902.

Sarontac. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Sarrochau. A former Winnebago village on the site of Taycheedah, Fond du Lac co., Wis.—Grignon in Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., III, 288, 1857.

Sarrope. According to information of a former Spanish captive among the Calusa (q. v.) in Florida, as related to Laudonnière in 1564, a great lake about 2 or 3 days journey n. e. from the Calusa territory and situated between that and C. Cañaveral. It had an inhabited island whose people were warlike and independent and traded coonti root to the neighboring tribes. This body of water was probably Kissimmee or, possibly, Okeechobee lake. (J. M.)

Sarope.—Laudonnière (1564) in Basanier, Histoire, in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 282, 1869.
Serope.—De l'Isle, map, 1700 (incorrectly marked as a town on the s. w. coast of Florida).

Sarsi (from the Siksika sa arsi, 'not good'). A tribe of the eastern group of the northern division of the Athapascan family. There is a myth or tradition found among the Tsattine, according to which their secession from the tribe is said to have been the sequel of a blood feud. According to this story, a dog belonging to a member of one division was killed by a young man of the other division, who was slain by the owner and avenged by his relatives. The animosity engendered between the two factions became so rooted and vindictive that the weaker party migrated. The explanation the Sarsi themselves give is one common in the Plains region. The people were crossing a lake when the hand of a boy became attached to a horn protruding from the ice. When the horn was struck the ice broke. Those who had not reached the neighborhood remained in the n. as the Tsattine, those who had already passed went on to the s. and became the Sarsi, and those near by were engulfed in the lake and became mythical water beings. At the beginning of the 19th century the Sarsi numbered 120 warriors, in 35 tents (Mackenzie, Voy., i, lxx, 1801). Their hunting grounds were on the upper Saskatchewan, toward the Rocky mts. Umfreville, in 1790 (Maine Hist. Soc. Coll., vi, 270, 1859), spoke of them as one of the leading tribes trading with the Hudson's Bay Co. Mackenzie found them on the n. branch of Saskatchewan r., few in number and appearing to have come from the N. W. He identified them with the Sekani. Richardson (Arct. Exped., ii, 6, 1851) said they lived near the Rocky mts., between the sources of Athabasca and Saskatchewan rs. Their customs have been greatly modified by their long residence among the Siksika, but their language remains fairly constant. Gallatin said that the Tsattine and Sarsi together numbered 150 hunters. Wilson, in 1888, found two bands, the Blood Sarsi and the real Sarsi. In 1897 two divisions were reported, one at Ft Calgary, on Bow r., lat. 51°, and the other near Battleford. In 1909 there were 197 engaged in farming, stock-raising, and woodcutting on the reserve at Calgary, Alberta, mingling little with other Indians except on occasions of ceremony. Rev. E. F. Wilson, who visited them in 1888, describes them as inferior in mental capacity to the Siksika, not so fine and tall a race, and less communicative, having no liking for white people.

Their dress consists of the breech-clout, blanket, leggings, beaded moccasins, and a gray, white, or colored blanket thrown loosely over one or both shoulders. Both men and women paint the upper part of their faces with ocher or vermilion. They wear brooches and earrings of steel, and bracelets and necklaces of beads, bones, claws, teeth, and brass wire, and finger-rings of coiled brass wire. They live in conical tipis in summer, and in low log huts, plastered with mud, in winter. Their chief handicrafts are the preparation of skins, of which they make their clothing and saddles for their numerous ponies, and the making of bows of cherry wood and arrows of willow, which are winged with feathers and pointed with sharp filed pieces of scrap-iron, the shaft having four shallow grooves down its entire length. Some of the men have from two to four wives, whom they can divorce at pleasure, restoring the presents received with the wife, or their equivalent. Girls are often betrothed at 10 years of age and married at 14. After betrothal they must look no man in the face. A man must not meet his mother-in-law, and if he accidentally touch her he must give her a present. The Sarsi have little knowledge of medicinal roots and herbs; most of their physicians are women. As among many other Indian tribes, a doctor when called in heats a stone in the fire, touches it with his finger, and with the same finger presses various parts of the patient's body in order to divine the seat and character of the malady. He then sucks the affected place, pretending to draw out the disease and spit it from his mouth, the performance being accompanied with the beating of a drum and the shaking of a rattle. The Sarsi know how to cauterize efficaciously with burning touchwood, and they use the vapor bath, building a low bower of bent green saplings covered with blankets, within which red-hot stones are placed in a hole in the ground, and over these the patient pours water that is handed him from outside. When thoroughly steamed he rushes out and plunges into cold water, sometimes with fatal result. The dead are wound in tent cloths and blankets and deposited on scaffolds in a burial ground. A warrior's pony is shot, and blankets, clothing, utensils, and food are left beside the corpse. The bodies of distinguished warriors or chiefs are placed in tipis (4th Rep.

N. W. Tribes Canada, 242-255, 1889). The language of the Sarsi is uncorrupted, notwithstanding association with the Siksika. (J. O. D. P. E. G.)

Sasabaithi (Sāsábūithi, 'looking up,' or 'looking around,' i. e. 'watchers'). A band of the Arapaho, q. v.

Saschutkenne ('people of the black bear'). A tribe of the Sekani who hunt on the w. declivity of the Rocky mts., about lat. 56° and northward, and before 1892 traded at Ft Connolly, Brit. Col. Dawson (Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., 200B, 1889) stated that they had recently returned to the headwaters of Black r. after having abandoned the region for a number of years. In 1890 Morice gave their habitat as Thutage lake and northward, w. of the Rocky mts.

Saskatchewan Assiniboin. An Assiniboin band of 50 lodges that dwelt in 1808 about Eagle hills and s. Saskatchewan r., Assiniboia.—Henry-Thompson Jour., II, 523, 1897.

Saskatoon. A name in use in the Canadian N. W. for the service berry (Amelanchier canadensis): probably a corruption of miḥskwatomin, which is the name applied to the fruit in the Cree dialect of Algonquian, signifying 'fruit of miḥskwat, the tree of much wood,' from miḥ 'much', and ḥskwat 'wood'. Saskatoon occurs also as a place-name in the above-named region. (A. F. C.)

Sassaba. A minor Chippewa chief of the Crane gens, who first appears in history as a member of Tecumseh's forces at the battle of the Thames, Canada, Oct. 5, 1813, in which his brother, to whom he seems to have been greatly attached, was killed while fighting by his side. This incident embittered Sassaba against the Americans during the remainder of his life. When Lewis Cass visited Sault Ste Marie, Mich., in 1820, to negotiate a treaty with the Chippewa for purchasing a small tract of land, Sassaba, who was one of the chiefs assembled on this occasion, not only manifested his bitter animosity toward the United States authorities, but displayed his eccentric character as well. During the council he hoisted the British flag over his tent, which was torn down by Gen. Cass in person. On this occasion he was thus dressed: "Beginning at the top an eagle's feather, bear's grease, vermilion and indigo, a red British military coat with two enormous epaulets, a large British silver medal, breech-clout, leggins, and moccasins." He arose in council and remarked gruffly that the Chippewa did not wish to sell their land; and refusing the pipe, kicked over the presents that had been placed before him, and rushed from the tent under its side. He refused to sign the treaty (Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 414-15, 1868). On Sept. 25, 1822, Sassaba and his wife and child were drowned at Sault Ste Marie. He had been drinking heavily at Point aux Pins, 6 m. above the rapids, and was intoxicated during the trip. According to Schoolcraft (Pers. Mem., 119, 1851) he would often walk through the village where he resided, divested of every particle of clothing except a large gray wolf's skin, which he had drawn over his body in such manner as to let the tail dangle behind. From this habit the name Myeengun ('wolf') was sometimes applied to him. He was also known as The Count. (C. T.)

Sassacus (perhaps the equivalent of Massachuset Sassakusu, 'he is wild' (untamed), 'fierce.'—Gerard). The noted and last chief of the Pequot tribe while yet in their integrity; born near Groton, Conn., about 1560, killed by the Mohawk in New York, June 1637. He was the son and successor of Wopigwoot, the first chief of the tribe with whom the whites had come in contact, who was killed by the Dutch, about 1632, at or near the site of Hartford, Conn., then the principal Pequot settlement. Soon after assuming the chiefship, in Oct. 1634 Sassacus sent an emissary to the governor of the Massachusetts Bay colony to ask for a treaty of friendship, offering as an inducement to surrender all the rights of the Pequot to the lands they had conquered, provided the colonists would settle a plantation among his people, an offer which he must have known he could not carry out, and perhaps had no intention of trying to fulfill, as he nourished bitter enmity toward the whites. This proposal had the effect of turning against him Uncas, the Mohegan chief, who was related to him by both blood and marriage. The domain of the Pequot during Sassacus's chiefship extended from Narragansett bay to Hudson r., including the larger part of Long id., and it is said that at the height of his prosperity no fewer than 26 sachems were subordinate to him. Because of his depredations, especially on the neighboring tribes, the colonists decided in 1636 to make war on the Pequot. The name of Sassacus had inspired such terror among the surrounding tribes that the Indian allies of the whites could not believe the latter would dare to make a direct attack on the stronghold of this wily chief. The war was soon ended, and Sassacus, having suffered defeat and the loss of a large portion of his people, fled with 20 or 30 of his warriors to the Mohawk country. Even here he found no safety, for before the close of 1637 his scalp and those of his brother and five other Pequot chiefs were sent to the governor of Massachusetts by the Mohawk. As Sassacus had carried with him in his flight a large quantity of wampum, a desire on the part of the Mohawk to possess this treasure may have led to the death of himself and his followers. Sassacus was spoken of by the commissioners in 1647 as "the malignant, furious Piquot," while, on the other hand, De Forest styles him "a renowned warrior and a noble and high-spirited man." Satank. See Setangya.

Satanta (properly Set-t'aiñ'-te, 'White Bear'). A noted Kiowa chief, born about 1830; died by suicide in prison, Oct. 11, 1878. For about 15 years before his death he was recognized as second chief in his tribe, the first rank being accorded to his senior, Setängyâ, or Satank, and later to Lone Wolf, although probably neither of these equaled him in force and ability. His eloquence in council gained for him the title of "Orator of the Plains," while his manly boldness and directness and his keen humor made him a favorite with army officers and commissioners in spite of his known hostility to the white man's laws and civilization. He was one of the signers of the Medicine Lodge treaty of 1867, by which his tribe agreed to go on a reservation, his being the second Kiowa name attached to the document. The tribe, however, delayed coming in until compelled by Custer, who seized Satanta and Lone Wolf as hostages for the fulfilment of the conditions. For boastfully avowing his part in a murderous raid into Texas in 1871, he, with Setangya and Big Tree, was arrested and held for trial in Texas. Setangya was killed while resisting the guard. The other two were tried and sentenced to life imprisonment in the Texas State penitentiary. Two years later they were released, conditional upon the good behavior of their people, but in the fall of 1874, the Kiowa having again gone on the warpath, Satanta was rearrested and taken back to the penitentiary where he finally committed suicide by throwing himself from an upper story of the hospital.

In appearance Satanta was a typical Plains warrior, of fine physique, erect bearing, and piercing glance. One who saw him in prison in 1873 describes him as "a tall, finely formed man, princely in carriage, on whom even the prison garb seemed elegant," and meeting his visitor "with as much dignity and grace as though he were a monarch receiving a foreign ambassador." His memory is cherished by the Kiowa as that of one of their greatest men. See Mooney, Calendar History of the Kiowa Inds., 17th Rep. B. A. E., 1898. (J. M.)

Satapo (probably Creek: sáta 'persimmon,' api 'tree'). A town, possibly of the Upper Creeks, mentioned by Juan de la Vándera in 1567 (Smith, Colec.

Doc. Fla., i, 18, 1857); apparently on the n. border of the Creek country.

Satayomi. A former village connected with San Francisco Solano mission, Cal.—Bancroft, Hist. Cal., ii, 506, 1886.

Satumuo.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861. Saturaumo.—Ibid.

Saturiba. A Timucuan tribe in Florida, occupying, about 1565, the territory on both sides of lower St John r., with the adjacent coast territory, northward to Satilla r., Ga., including Cumberland (Tacatacuru) id., beyond which was Guale (Yamassee) territory. The statement quoted in Brinton (Fla. Penin., 120, 1859) making St. Helena, S. Car., their northern boundary, is incorrect. They were at war with the Timucua, their nearest neighbors higher up on the river, and afterward with the Spaniards, but welcomed and aided the French during the short stay of the latter. Their chief was said to rule 30 subchiefs, each perhaps representing a different village. The name may have been properly that of the head chief rather than of the tribe, the two being frequently confused by the early explorers. It does not occur in Pareja's list of Timucuan dialects in 1612, the tribe being probably noted under one of the unidentified names in the list, viz, Itafi, Tucururu, or Mocama, the last two being specially designated as located on the coast. All the Indians of this region were Christianized by Franciscan missionaries before the end of the 16th century. See Patica, Timucua, Timucuan Family. (J. M.)

Sauk (Osā'kiwīg, 'people of the outlet,' or, possibly, 'people of the yellow earth,' in contradistinction from the Muskwakiwuk, 'Red Earth People', a name of the Foxes). One of a number of Algonquian tribes whose earliest known habitat was embraced within the eastern peninsula of Michigan, the other tribes being the Potawatomi, the "Nation of the Fork," and probably the famous Mascoutens and the Foxes. The present name of Saginaw bay (Sāginā've, signifying 'the country or place of the Sauk') is apparently derived from the ethnic appellative Sauk. There is presumptive evidence that the Sauk, with the tribes mentioned above, were first known to Europeans under the general ethnic term "Gens de Feu" or that of "Asistagueronon," the latter being the Huron translation of the specific name Potawatomi, both the terms in question being first recorded by Champlain and Sagard. In 1616 Champlain, while in what is now Ontario, learned from the Tionontati, or Tobacco Nation, that their kindred, the Neutral Nation, aided the Ottawa (Cheueux releuez) in waging war against the Gens de Feu, i. e. 'People of the Fire,' and that the Ottawa carried on a warfare against "another nation of savages who were called Asista-gueronon, which is to say, 'People of the Place of the Fire,' who were distant from the Ottawa 10 days' journey; and lastly, in more fully describing the country, manners, and customs of the Ottawa, he added, "In the first place, they wage war against another nation of savages who are called Asistagueronon, which is to say, 'people of the fire,' distant from them 10 days' journey." He supplemented this statement with the remark that "they pressed me strongly to assist them against their enemies, who are on the shore of the Mer Douce [Lake Huron], distant 200 leagues." Sagard, who was in Canada during the years 1623-26, wrote in his Histoire du Canada (I, 194, ed. 1866), that the sedentary and the migratory Ottawa together waged war against the Asistagueronon, who were 9 or 10 days' journey by canoe from the Ottawa, a distance which he estimated at "about 200 leagues and more of travel."

Before the Sauk became known as an independent tribe, it is evident that they formed a part of this group of important Algonquian communities, which was called by the Hurons and cognate peoples "Asistagueronon," and by the French, "Nation or People of the Fire," a translation of the former appellative. In order therefore to understand clearly the ethnic relations of the Sauk, it will be necessary to review the earliest known facts relating to this interesting group of tribes. So far as known, the Sauk were first mentioned independently in the Jesuit Relation for 1640 (35, ed. 1858) under the generic Huron name Hvattoehronon, i. e. 'people of the sunset,' or briefly, 'westerners.' They were here mentioned among a number of other tribes along with the Foxes (Skenchichronon), the Potawatomi (Attistaehronon), the Kickapoo (Ontarahronon, 'lake people'), the Mascoutens (Oherokouaehronon, 'people of the place of grass'), the Winnebago (Aoueatsiouaehronon, 'saline or brackish water people'), and the Crane band of the Miami (Attochingochronon). The following citations from the Jesuit Relations embody some of the evidence that the Sauk, the Potawatomi (q. v.), and the Nation of the Fork, were generally comprised in the Huron ethnic appellative Asistagueronon, i. e. 'People of the Place of Fire,' which is the literal signification of the tribal name Potawatomi.

Father Allouez, the first person to describe the Sauk, wrote in 1667 that they were more savage than all the other peoples he had met; that they were a populous tribe, although they had no fixed dwelling place, being wanderers and vagabonds in the forests. He was told that if they or the Foxes found a person in an isolated place they would kill him, especially if he were a Frenchman, for they could not endure the sight of the whiskers of the European. Yet, two years later he reported that the first place in which he began to give religious instruction was in a village of the "Ousaki," situated at the DePere Rapids, Wis., wherein he found several tribes in winter quarters, namely, the "Ousaki, the Pouteouatami, the Outagami [Foxes], and the Ovenibigoutz [Winnebago]—about 600 souls." Allouez adds that a league and a half away there was another village of about 150 persons; that at 4 leagues farther away there was another of about 100 persons; that at 8 leagues away there was another of about 300 persons, situated on the opposite side of the bay; that at 25 leagues, at a place called Ovestatinong, dwelt the Foxes, and that at a day's journey from this tribe dwelt the Maksudenteng [Mascoutens] and the Oumami [Miami], the latter being reputed to be a band of the Illinois. The Indians of this region, the Father reported, were "more barbarous than usual," having no ingenuity, not knowing even how "to make a bark dish or a ladle," using shells instead.

In the Jesuit Relation for 1658 (21, ed. 1858) Father Ragueneau reported what he had learned concerning the upper lake tribes from Father Bruilletes, a skilful and accomplished Huron and Algonquian linguist, who in listing these tribes used to some extent the knowledge of these communities obtained by Radisson and Groseilliers, who had then but recently discovered and visited a number of them. In the descriptive list of these tribes cited by Father Ragueneau, the following statements are pertinent here: "The third nation is distant about 3 days' journey by water from the town of St Michel, going inland. It is composed of the Makoutensak and the Outitchakouk [i. e. the Crane Miami]. The two Frenchmen [probably Radisson and Groseilliers] who have traveled in those countries say that these people are of a very mild nature." . . . "The fourteenth nation has 30 towns, inhabited by the Atsistagherronnons. They are southwest a quarter south at 6 or 7 days' journey from St Michel. The Onondaga have recently declared war against them." This is presumptive evidence from seemingly competent authority that the ethnic names Mascoutens and Atsistagherronnons were not in 1658 by any means synonymous or convertible epithets, and that therefore the peoples designated by them were not identical. This confusion as to names in question persisted until about 1671, as the following citations will show. In the Jesuit Relation for 1670 (99, ed. 1858) Father Allouez stated that "We entered the river which leads to the Machkoutench, called Assista Ectaronnons, Nation of the Fire, by the Hurons"; but in the Relation for the following year (p. 45) Father Allouez stated that "The Nation of the Fire bears this name by an error, properly calling themselves Maskoutench, which signifies a land cleared of trees, such as is that which these people inhabit; but because by the change of a few letters which one makes, this same word signifies fire, it follows that one calls them the Nation of the Fire." There is in each of these statements an error which was due directly to the process of the gradual elimination of tribes becoming known from a group of unknown peoples or tribes which bore a generic name "people of the place of fire," derived from the specific name of an important one of these tribes, the Potawatomi (q. v.), whose name signifies literally, 'people of the place of fire.' This confounding of several tribes one with another, and the consequent misapplication of specific and generic names, were made evidently not by the Hurons but by French traders and missionaries.

In the Jesuit Relation for 1671 (25, ed. 1858) Father Dablon, speaking of Green bay, Wisconsin, wrote that the Menominee, the Sauk, the Potawatomi, and other neighboring tribes, "being driven from their own countries, which are the lands southward near Missilimakinac, have taken refuge at the head of this bay, beyond which one can see inland the 'Nation of the Fire,' or Mathkoutench, with one of the Illinois tribes called Oumiami, and the Foxes." And in the same Relation (p. 37), he said: "The three nations who are now in the bay of the Winnebago as strangers resided on the mainland which is s. of this island [i. e. Missilimakinac]—some on the shores of the Lake of the Illinois [i. e. Michigan], others on those of the Lake of the Hurons. A part of those who call themselves Salteurs [Chippewa] possessed lands on the mainland toward the w. . . . Four villages of the Ottawa also had their lands in these quarters, but especially those who bore the name of the island, calling themselves Missilimakinac, and who were so numerous that some of those who are still living [1670] assert that they composed 30 villages, and that they had enclosed themselves in a fort a league and a half in circuit, when the Iroquois, flushed with a victory gained over 3,000 men of this tribe who had carried the war even into the country of the Mohawk, came to defeat them." Further (p. 42), the Father relates: "Four nations make their abode here, namely, those who bear the name Puants [i. e., the Winnebago], who have always lived here, as it were, in their own country, and who, having been defeated by the Illinois, their enemies, have been reduced from a very flourishing and populous people to nothing; the Potawatomi, the Sauk, and the Nation of the Fork (de la Fourche) also live here, but as strangers, the fear of the Iroquios having driven them from their lands, which are between the Lake of the Hurons and that of the Illinois." There can be little if any doubt that in these citations the names "Iroquois" and "Mohawk" should be replaced by "Neuters," who to these fugitive tribes were known also as 'Nadō'weg' (see Nadowu); otherwise established facts are contravened by these statements, and it has already been shown that the "Neutre Nation" aided the Ottawa against the tribes on the shores of L. Huron. The foregoing quotations make it evident that the Potawatomi, the Sauk, and the 'Nation of the Fork' were included in the Asistagueronon of Champlain and Sagard, represented by them as dwelling in 1616 on the western shore lands of L. Huron and farther westward. Thus far no evidence has been adduced to show that Mascoutens and Asistagueronon were at first convertible or synonymous appellatives.

Further, Father Dablon, in the Jesuit Relation for 1670 (79, ed. 1858), said with reference to the Sault Sainte Marie: "The first and native inhabitants of this place are those who call themselves Pahouit-ing8ach Irini, whom the French name Saulteurs, because these are they who dwell at the Sault, as in their own country, the others being there only by adoption; they number only 150 souls, but they have united with three other tribes, who number more than 550 persons, to whom they have made a cession of the rights of their native country; they also reside there fixedly, except during the time in which they go to hunt. Those whom one calls the Nouquet range for that purpose southward of L. Superior, whence they came originally, and the Outchibous [Chippewa] with the Marameg, northward of the same lake, which they regard as their own proper country."

From the Jesuit Relation for 1644 it is learned that the long struggle between the so-called "Neutral Nation" and the "Nation du Feu" at that time was still maintained with unabated fury. Father Jerome Lallemant (Jes. Rel. 1644, 98, ed. 1858) states that in the summer of 1642 the Neuters with a force of 2,000 warriors advanced into the country of the "Nation du Feu" and attacked a town of this tribe which was strongly defended by palisades and manned by 900 resolute warriors; that these patriots withstood the assaults of the besiegers for 10 days, but that at the end of this time the devoted place was carried. Many of its defenders were killed on the spot, and 800 captives—men, women, and children—were taken; and 70 of the best warriors among the prisoners were burned at the stake, the merciless victors putting out the eyes and cutting away the lips of all the old men and leaving them thus to die miserably. The Father adds the interesting statement that "this Nation of the Fire is more populous than all the Neutral Nation, all the Hurons, and all the Iroquois, enemies of the Hurons, put together; it consists of a large number of villages wherein the Algonquin language is spoken." This last citation is further proof that the term "Fire Nation," or "Nation of the Place of Fire," at that period was applied in a broad general sense rather than in a specific one. Apparently it embraced all the tribes formerly dwelling in the eastern peninsula of the present state of Michigan, and later removed to the n. and w. shores of the present L. Michigan, and still later it embraced some of the Illinois tribes. From the Jesuit Relation for 1642, (97, ed. 1858) it is learned that the Saulteurs informed the Jesuit fathers that "a certain tribe more distant [than the Sault Sainte Marie from the Huron mission], which they call Pouteatami, had abandoned its country and had come to take refuge with the inhabitants of the Sault to escape from some other hostile tribe that vexes them with ceaseless wars." This shows that the Potawatomi were then westward from the home of the Saulteurs, and that their emigration from the Michigan peninsula was not then of many years' standing.

It has been shown from historical data that for a long period before 1651 the Neuters and the Ottawa together waged bitter warfare against a group of tribes which became known to the French writers as Gens de Feu, or 'People of the Fire,' and as Asistagueronon, or 'People of the Place of Fire,' and later as the Mascoutens, by an error, the last name meaning, as an appellative, 'People Dwelling on Small Prairies.' There is no known historical data showing that, during the time that the Ottawa and the Neuters occupied the peninsula n. of L. Erie, the Iroquois, specifically so called, carried on any warlike operations against tribes dwelling westward of the two just mentioned. The fact is that the name Nadoweg, or Nadō'weg, was a general name of hateful significance which was applied by Algonquian tribes generally to any people of Iroquoian stock, as the Neuters, the Tionontati, and the Hurons. Now, inasmuch as the Neuters with their allies, the Ottawa, encountered their enemies on the western "shores" of L. Huron, i. e., in the present Michigan peninsula, and as it is known that as late as 1642 the Neuters sent into this region a force of 2,000 warriors which destroyed a stronghold of their enemies, it can be said with propriety that the Algonquian tribes formerly inhabiting the peninsula were driven therefrom by the Nadō'weg, meaning, conclusively it would seem, the Neuters, but understood by the French missionaries and writers to signify the "Iroquois," properly so called. Hence, the confusion regarding the invaders who drove out the tribes formerly dwelling westward of L. Huron. But it is also true that after the total defeat of the Neuters in 1651 by the "true" Iroquois, or League of Five Nations, these latter tribes came in touch at once with the tribes which had been at war against the Neuters, and in some cases naturally the Iroquois inherited the quarrels of the Neuters. The Iroquois proper did not, therefore, drive out the Potawatomi, the Sauk, the Foxes, and the other fugitive tribes from their ancient territories w. of L. Huron, for the Potawatomi were in Wisconsin as early as 1634, when Nicolet found them there. It was nearly 20 years later that the "true" Iroquois advanced into the lake region in pursuit of the Hurons, the Tionontati, and the Neuter fugitives, fleeing from the ruins of their towns and homes.

It seems clear that the tribes of the Algonquian stock formerly inhabiting the northern peninsula of Michigan were driven out by the Neuters and the Ottawa, their allies. It is erroneous to assume that the fugitive tribes retreated first southward and then westward around the southern end of L. Michigan, directly across rather than directly away from the line of attack from the E. along Detroit and St. Clair rs. It is learned from Perrot that the Neuters occupied Detroit r. Most Indians who have been forced to retire from a battlefield or from their homes have shown that they were past-masters in the art of eluding a pursuing foe, and it has not been shown that the Sauk, the Potawatomi, the Kasawakoneton or Fork tribe, and their allies, were devoid of this characteristic trait. It is not probable, therefore, that the Sauk, starting from the shores of Saginaw bay, deliberately exposed their flank and rear to the direct attacks of the Neuters over a march exceeding 300 m. The more probable course of the retreat of the Sauk and their allies from the Michigan peninsula was evidently northwestward across Mackinaw straits into northern Michigan, thence westward to the region around Green bay and Fox r., where they were first found by the early French explorers.

From the Jesuit Relation for 1666-67 it is learned that bands of the Sauk and Foxes were dwelling in the vicinity of Shaugawaumikong (La Pointe) and that Father Allouez preached to them and baptized some of their children.

During 1671-72 the expatriated Hurons, composed largely of the Tionontati and the (Black) Squirrel band of the Ottawa (Sinagos), having perfected preparations, together marched against the Sioux, who were at peace with them. On their way they succeeded in corrupting the Sauk with presents, and the Foxes and Potawatomi also were induced to join the expedition. The united tribes mustered about 1,000 warriors for this raid, nearly all of whom were armed with guns and provided with ammunition which the first two tribes had obtained in Montreal during the previous year. As a precautionary measure they had moved their villages back to Michilimackinac and Manitoulin id. As soon as this force reached the Sioux country, it fell upon some small villages, putting the men to flight and capturing the women and children. Fugitives soon spread the alarm in all the allied villages of the Sioux, whence issued swarms of warriors who attacked the enemy so vigorously that the latter were forced to abandon a fort which they had commenced to erect and to flee in consternation. The Sioux pursued them so closely that they were enabled to kill many of the fugitives, some of whom threw away their arms to expedite their flight. These losses and those caused by hunger and the rigor of the weather resulted in the practical annihilation of the allies; the Foxes, the Kiskakon, and the Potawatomi, being less inured to the stress of warfare than the others, did not lose many warriors on this occasion, because they fled at the beginning of the combat. The Hurons, the Squirrel band of the Ottawa, and the Sauk, however, distinguished themselves by their courage and prowess, and by their stubborn resistance materially aided the others in making their escape. In the retreat, which was turned to a rout by the furious pursuit of the Sioux, the confusion became so great that many of the fugitives, driven by privation and hunger, were compelled to eat one another. The chief of the Squirrel band of the Ottawa was captured by the Sioux and condemned to torture by fire. They broiled pieces of his flesh and forced him to eat them. He and his brother-in-law, the Sauk chief, were thus fed until their death at the stake. The rest of the prisoners were shot to death with arrows.

Bacqueville de la Potherie says that in 1665-66 the Potawatomi took the southern, the Sauk the northern, part of Green bay, and the Winnebago, who were not fishermen, went into the forest to live on venison and bear meat. In the spring the Foxes notified the Sauk that they had established themselves in quarters 30 leagues from the bay, forming a settlement of about 600 lodges. The French, for prudent reasons, left to the Sauk the trade in peltries with the Foxes, since they could the more quietly deal with the Sauk in the autumn.

In 1721 the Sauk were still resident at Green bay, but owing to growing difficulties with the Foxes, they were on the point of removing to the St Joseph r. At this time their village was situated on the left bank of Fox r., near its mouth. Although consisting only of a small number of persons at this period, the Sauk had separated into two factions, of which one was attached to the Foxes and the other to the Potawatomi and the French. It was these latter who constituted the bulk of the village mentioned above.

In 1725 the Sauk, in sympathy with the Foxes and the Sioux, were preparing to attack the Illinois.

According to a letter of Beauharnois, dated July 21, 1729 (Wis. Hist. Coll., xvii, 63), the Sauk and the Potawatomi of St Joseph r., along with the Ottawa and the Chippewa of Michilimackinac, the Miami, Wea, and Hurons, together with the Potawatomi and Ottawa of Detroit, went to Montreal to inform him what had occurred concerning the Foxes, against whom they were then at war, and to learn what he desired them to do further. The Sauk, whose village was situated probably on the w. side of Fox r., near the site of the present city of Green Bay, Wis., gave in 1733 asylum to some refugee Foxes. When the Sieur De Villiers, the younger, attempted after a formal demand for the surrender of the Foxes by the Sauk to take them by force, the Sauk resisted and killed De Villiers and Monsieur De Repentigny and several other Frenchmen, thus repulsing the detachment of French and Indian allies. Three days later the Sauk evacuated their fort by night. They were pursued by the French and their Indian allies—the Ottawa, the Menominee, and the Chippewa—under the ensign, the Sieur De Villiers, who overtook the Sauk and the Foxes probably at what is now called Little Butte des Morts, near the present Appleton. De Villiers at once attacked the Sauk, and after several hours of fighting defeated them. The Sauk lost 20, the Foxes 9, and among the injured 9 others were mortally wounded. Among the French 13 officers and men were wounded and 2 were killed; the Ottawa lost 9 men, including their head chief; the Chippewa loss was 2 killed and 4 wounded.

The Marquis de Beauharnois, the governor of Canada, at once gave orders to attack the Sauk and the remaining Foxes to avenge the shedding of French blood. The death of De Villiers, who was the victor at LeRocher in 1730, led to two important events—first, the close confederation of the Sauk and the Foxes, and second, the removal of the united tribes from the territory of Wisconsin to the land of the Iowa, w. of the Mississippi. Previous to the events leading up to this migration the Sauk had ostensibly been allies of the French, even taking part in the war against the Foxes, but they had nevertheless clandestinely given aid and comfort to the devoted Foxes. From this period the united tribes became known as the Sauk and Foxes.

In 1777 the Spanish authorities at San Luis de Ylinneses knew the Sauk as one of the tribes that came from the English district "to receive presents at this post; that they had 400 warriors, and that they were kindly disposed toward the Spanish," for although "frequent bands" had visited "this village," they had caused no trouble. In 1780 Francisco Cruzat, a Spanish officer, wrote to Governor Bernardo Galvez, of Louisiana, that he had caused the Sauk to surrender to him two English banners and thirteen medals which they desired to be replaced with Spanish medals. Cruzat accordingly afterward made the exchange in order that he might "content said chiefs."

In the instructions for the Spanish Governor of St Louis, dated Feb. 15, 1781 (Wis. Hist. Coll., xviii, 419, 1908), the writer thereof said: "I believe it is excellent for Your Grace to have distinguished the zeal and affection of the Sac tribe who have so generously lent to our district in circumstances of so little advantage [to them]. . . . On this occasion, 16 medals are sent and 10 flags with 16 letters patent which Your Grace is to distribute among the chiefs of the Sac tribe, who, according to Your Grace's advice of the 28th of September, surrendered 13 English medals and three banners . . . I hope that in spite of the great presents which are distributed by the English among these tribes, and notwithstanding the small sum that we have, their hopes will prove empty, even though the [English] governor descend from Michilimackinac, which I doubt. At all events, the zeal, honor, and activity of Your Grace promises me a happy result on our part in their boasted attack on those settlements next Spring. I approve the determination which Your Grace took with the tribes of the Misuri, in making them hand over the two English banners which had been introduced among them. Chuteau [Chouteau] delivered me the 14 medals and 5 English flags which Your Grace recovered from the Sac and Pox [Potawatomi] tribes, as I have said, they were replaced on this occasion." These extracts show the good effect of the Spanish policy in restraining the extreme western tribes from following English agents against the American colonists.

Among the tribes of the Illinois country, the Sauk in 1769 received presents from the Spaniards.

In 1768 Carver found the chief town of the Sauk on Wisconsin r., probably on the site of Prairie du Sac; it consisted of about 90 lodges and 300 warriors.

From the journal of Peter Pond, 1773-75 (Wis. Hist. Coll., xviii, 335 et seq.), the following citation concerning the habits and customs of the Sauk is made: "These People are Cald Saukeas. They are of a Good Size and Well Disposed—Les Inclind to tricks and Bad manners than thare Nighbors. Thay will take of the traders Goods on Creadit in the fall for thare youse. In Winter and Except for Axedant thay Pay the Deapt Verrey Well for Indans I mite have sade Inlitend or Sivelised Indans which are in General made worse by the Operation. . . . Sum of thare Huts are Sixtey feet Long and Contanes Several fammalayes. . . . In the fall of ye Year thay Leave thare Huts and Go into the Woods in Quest of Game and Return in the Spring to thare Huts before Plantingtime. The Women Rase Grate Crops of Corn, Been, Punkens, Potatoes, Millans and artikels—the Land is Exaleant—and Clear of Wood Sum Distans from the Villeag. Thare [are] Sum Hundred of Inhabitants. Thare amments are Singing, Dancing, Smoking, Matcheis, Gaming, Feasting, Drinking, Playing the Slite of Hand, Hunting and thay are famas in Mageack. Thay are Not Verrey Gellas of thare Women. In General the Women find meanes to Grattafy them Selves without Consent of the Men." Pond adds that the Sauk warriors often joined the war parties of neighboring tribes against the Indians on Missouri r. and westward; that sometimes they went to the vicinity of Santa Fé, New Mexico, and captured Spanish horses, of which he had seen a large number.

A Sauk band, which later became known as the Missouri River Sauk, had been for some time in the habit of wintering near the post of St. Louis on the Missouri. One winter, about 1804, the head-men of this band were drawn into negotiations with Government officials at the post. It is an open question if these leaders knew what they were doing. At any rate the band became a party to negotiations, which in time were to lead to the undoing of the Sauk and Foxes, by which these tribes were to relinquish all claim to territory in Wisconsin, Illinois, and Missouri. The knowledge of what the Missouri River band had done naturally incensed the rest of the people. It was then that the band realized what it had done, but it was too late. Knowing the temper of the people, the band remained away, and it has continued to do so ever since. The Foxes became so angry with the Sauk for letting one of their bands act for all the people that they began at once to draw away from the Sauk, and in the course of a generation they had moved over into their hunting grounds in Iowa. Other agreements were entered into with the three divisions of these people before the treaty of 1804 was finally carried out. Out of all this, in connection with the general unrest of the tribes of this region, arose the so-called Black Hawk war in 1832. It is customary to lay the cause of this conflict to the refusal of the Sauk to comply with the terms of agreement they had entered into with the Government with reference particularly to the lands on Rock r. in Illinois. Be that as it may, the actual fighting between the Sauk and the Government was of a rather feeble character. But the fighting between the Sauk on the one hand and the Sioux, Omaha, and Menominee on the other was extremely severe. These tribes, together with the Potawatomi and Winnebago, had previously sent emissaries to the Sauk urging them on to fight the whites and at the same time promising immediate assistance. The Potawatomi were the most persistent in this matter; they had prophets in the camp of the Sauk preaching restoration of the old hunting grounds, the return of the game, and the sudden miraculous destruction of the whites; but when hostilities began, their chief, Shabonee (q. v.), was the first to warn the whites against the Sauk. Among the Sauk at this time was an able man of the Thunder clan known to the whites under the name of Black Hawk (q. v.). He was not a chief, but had gained a good record for bravery and leadership in war. He was deeply religious, and thoroughly patriotic. He had fought under Tecumseh and had become imbued with some of the ideas of the great Shawnee. About this man rallied the hostile Sauk. He first tried holding the Sauk in check until he could count on the combined help of the Kickapoo and Foxes, but the fighting got under way before he was ready. The Sauk were thoroughly beaten, and sought refuge among the Foxes in Iowa. Considerable resentment was felt against the Winnebago for having delivered Black Hawk over to the whites when he had come to them seeking refuge; and the same feeling was entertained toward the Potawatomi for going over to the whites. For some time previous to this trouble there had been intimate relationship between the Sauk and these two tribes. This conflict practically broke the power of the Sauk and Foxes. They united again in Iowa, this time to avenge themselves against the Sioux, Omaha, and Menominee, whom they chastised in lively fashion, but not enough to satisfy their desires. So constantly harassed were the Sioux that they finally left Iowa altogether, and the Menominee withdrew northward where they continued to remain. In 1837 the Sauk and Foxes made the last of their various cessions of Iowa lands, and were given in exchange a tract across the Missouri in Kansas. Here they remained practically as one people for about 20 years. But internal dissensions, due largely to Keokuk (q. v.), were causing them to grow apart. They maintained separate villages, the Sauk in one and the Foxes in another. One summer about the years 1857-59, the leading Foxes returned from a buffalo hunt and found that during their absence the Sauk had made a treaty with the Government by the terms of which the Sauk and Foxes were to take up lands in severalty and sell the remainder, the whole transaction having been negotiated by whites to get possession of the Indians' land for purposes of speculation. The Fox chief refused to ratify the agreement on behalf of the Foxes, and for so doing was deprived of his chieftainship; but the Foxes did not recognize the act of the agent deposing their chief. In the fall the Fox chief went away to Iowa, and with him most of the Foxes. An incident occurring shortly before this time, i. e., in 1854, had much to do with hastening the departure of many of the Foxes for Iowa. While on a buffalo hunt a party of about 50 men were attacked by a large force of Plains Indians, consisting, it is said, of Cheyenne, Arapaho, Kiowa, and Comanche. The Foxes were armed with "Kentucky rifles," while the others had only bows and arrows. Retreating upon a rise of ground where approach was possible from only one direction, the Foxes beat off their assailants, inflicting heavy loss. On their return home they became uneasy lest the Government, on learning the news of the slaughter, might deal sternly with them, and so they quietly stole off to Iowa. A few Foxes had never gone to Kansas, but had remained in Iowa. Some had returned before the main exodus of 1859. They finally found a place on Iowa r., near Tama City, where they bought a small piece of land. This has been added to from time to time till they now have more than 3,000 acres which they hold in common. They have nothing more to do with the Sauk politically. In 1867 the Sauk ceded their lands in Kansas and in exchange were given a tract in Indian Ter. In 1889 they took up lands in severalty and sold the remainder to the Government.

Language.—It is not yet possible to determine the dialectic position of the Sauk, in particular their position with reference to other dialects of the Central Algonquian group from the standpoint of mutual intelligibility. An approximate order of relationship may be tentatively offered. The Sauk is intimately related first to the Fox and then to the Kickapoo. The Shawnee probably comes next.

Material culture.—The culture of the Sauk was that of the eastern wooded area. They were a canoe people while they were in the country of the Great Lakes, using both the birch-bark canoe and the dugout. They still retain the dugout, and learned the use and construction of the bull-boat on coming out upon the plains. They practised agriculture on an extensive scale; they cultivated the ground for maize, squashes, beans, and tobacco. Despite their fixed abodes and villages they did not live a sedentary life altogether, for much of the time they devoted to the chase, hunting game and fishing almost the whole year round. They were acquainted with wild rice, and hunted the buffalo. They did not get possession of horses until after the Black Hawk war in 1832, and they did not become very familiar with the horse and the mule until after their arrival in Kansas, after the year 1837. Their abode was the bark house in warm weather and the oval flag-reed lodge in winter; the bark house was characteristic of the village. Every gens had one large bark house wherein were celebrated the festivals of the gens. In this lodge hung the sacred bundles of the gens, and here dwelt the priests that watched over them. It is said that some of these lodges were of the length required to accommodate five fires. The ordinary bark dwelling had but a single fire, which was at the center.

Social organization.—Society was rather complex. In the days when the tribe was much larger there were numerous gentes. There may be as many as 14 gentes yet in existence. These are: Trout, Sturgeon, Bass, Great Lynx or Fire Dragon, Sea, Fox, Wolf, Bear, Bear-potato, Elk, Swan, Grouse, Eagle, and Thunder. It seems that at one time there was a more rigid order of rank both socially and politically than at present. For example, chiefs came from the Trout and Sturgeon gentes, and war chiefs from the Fox gens; and there were certain relationships of courtesy between one gens and another, as when one acted the rôle of servants to another, seen especially on the occasion of a gens ceremony. Marriage was restricted to men and women of different gentes, and was generally attended with an exchange of presents between the families of the pair. Woman as a rule was paid formal courtship before marriage. In the case of death, a man might marry the sister of his deceased wife, or a widow might become the wife of the brother of her dead husband. Polygamy was practised, but was not usual; it was a privilege that went with wealth and social prestige. A child followed the gens of the father, but it frequently happened that the mother was given the right to name; in that case the child took a name peculiar to the gens of the mother but was yet in the gens of the father. But for this practice the gens of an individual could generally be known from the nature of the name. The name is intimately connected with the gens; for example, a name meaning 'he that moves on ahead flashing light' refers to lightning, and is a name peculiar to the Thunder gens. Besides the grouping into gentes, the tribe was further divided into two great social groups or phratries: Kish-kō^a and Oshkash^a. The painting color of the first was white clay, and that of the second was charcoal. A child entered into a group at birth, sometimes the father, sometimes the mother determining which group. The several groups engaged one another in all manner of contests, especially in athletics. The Sauk never developed a soldier society with the same degree of success as did the Foxes, but they did have a buffalo society; it is said that the first was due to contact with the Sioux, and it is reasonable to suppose that the second was due to influence also from the Plains. There were a chief and a council. As stated, the chiefs came from the Trout and Sturgeon gentes, and the council consisted of these, the war-chiefs or heads of families, and all the warriors. Politically the chief was little more than a figurehead, but socially he occupied first place in the tribe. Not infrequently, however, by force of character and by natural astuteness in the management of tribal affairs the chief might exercise virtually autocratic power. Furthermore, his person was held sacred, and for that reason he was given loyal homage.

Religion.—The religion of the Sauk is fundamentally the belief in what are now commonly known as manitos. The sense of the term is best given by the combined use of the two words "power" and "magic." The world is looked on as inhabited by beings permeated with a certain magic force, not necessarily malicious and not necessarily beneficent, the manifestation of which might produce one or the other effect. Objects in nature held to be endowed with this force become the recipients of varying degrees of adoration. A child is early taught to get into personal relation with some ma-nito by means of fasting and vigil to secure his tutelary or genius. The manitos of Sauk mythology and religious worship are represented in all nature. They are human beings, animals, birds, fishes, reptiles, insects, plants, fire, water, and all the elements personified. The mythology of the Sauk is rich with fables of anthropomorphic beasts and beings. The principal myth is concerned with the god of life, called Nanabozho by cognate tribes, with the flood, and with the restoration of the earth.

The Sauk had numerous ceremonies, social and religious. Some of these they still retain. The chief two religious ceremonies still in existence are the gens festivals and the secret rite of the Midewiwin, or Grand Medicine Society. The gens festival is held twice a year—in the spring, when thanksgiving is offered to the manitos for the new season, and in the summer after the fields ripen. The meeting of the Midewiwin is generally held but once a year, during the spring, when a ceremony is conducted by a group composed of men and women bound together by vows of secrecy. This society is entered by initiation and the payment of a fee, and the ceremony is conducted with an elaborate ritual on the occasion of the admittance of a new member, who takes the place of one who has died during the preceding year. Next in importance to these are the rites connected with death and adoption. To express grief for dead kindred, they blackened their faces with charcoal, fasted, and abstained from the use of vermilion and of ornaments in dress. The Sauk practised four different methods of burial: (1) the corpse was laid away in the branches of a tree or upon a scaffold; (2) it was placed in a sitting posture, with the back supported, out on the open ground; (3) it was seated in a shallow grave with all but the face buried and a shelter was placed over the grave; (4) there was complete burial in the ground. The ghost world is said to be in the W. beyond the setting sun, and thither it is said the people go after death. The brother of the culture-hero is master of the ghost world, while the culture-hero himself is said to be at the N., in the region of snow and ice. The Sauk are looking for his return, when they believe the world will come to an end, and they and the culture-hero will go to join his brother.

The close relations of the Sauk with the Foxes in historical times make it difficult to form more than an approximate estimate of their numbers in the past, but it is probable that the population of the tribe never exceeded 3,500 souls. When first known to history, i. e. in 1650, the Sauk and Foxes together numbered probably 6,500 (Sauk 3,500, Foxes 3,000). Perrot, writing in the first quarter of the 18th century, says that the Potawatomi, the Sauk, and the Foxes composed a body of more than 1,000 warriors. The principal estimates of the Sauk alone are: 750 persons in 1736; 1,000 (1759); 2,000 (1766); 2,250 (1783); 2,850 (1810); 4,800 (Beltrami, 1825); and 2,500 (1834). The two tribes together have been estimated at 3,000 (1820); 6,400 (1825); 5,300 (1834); 5,000 (1837). The estimates of the combined tribes indicate that the Foxes (q. v.) were the more numerous, but these appear to be incorrect. In 1885 the two tribes had a total population of about 930, of whom 457 were in Indian Ter., 380 (who claimed to be Foxes only) were at Tama, Iowa, and 87 in s. e. Nebraska; in addition there were a few at the various Indian schools. The Report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1909 gives 352 persons (almost all Foxes) at the Sauk and Fox agency, Iowa, 536 (chiefly Sauk) at the Sauk and Fox agency in Oklahoma, and 87 Sauk and Foxes (chiefly Sauk) in Kansas, a total Sauk and Fox population of 975.

The Sauk made or were parties to the following treaties with the United States: Treaty of Ft Harmar, Jan. 9, 1789; St Louis, Mo. (Sauk and Fox), Nov. 3, 1804; Portage des Sioux, Mo. (Sauk of Missouri), Sept. 13, 1815; St Louis, Mo., May 13, 1816; Ft Armstrong, Ill. (Sauk and Fox), Sept. 3, 1822; Washington, D. C. (Sauk and Fox), Aug. 4, 1824; Prairie du Chien, Wis. (Sauk and Fox), Aug. 19, 1825, and July 15, 1830; Ft Armstrong, Ill. (Sauk and Fox), Sept. 21, 1832; Ft Leavenworth, Mo. (Sauk and Fox), Sept. 17, 1836; near Dubuque, Iowa (Sauk and Fox), Sept. 27 and 28, 1836; Washington, D. C. (Sauk and Fox), Oct. 21, 1837; ditto (Sauk and Fox of Missouri), same date and place; Sauk and Fox agency, Ia. (Sauk and Fox), Oct. 11, 1847; Washington, D. C. (Sauk and Fox of Missouri), May 18, 1854; Sauk and Fox agency, Kan. (Sauk and Fox), Oct. 1, 1859; Nemaha agency, Nebr. (Sauk and Fox), Mar. 6, 1861; and Washington, D. C. (Sauk and Fox), Feb. 18, 1867.

Sault au Recollet (French: 'rapids of the Récollet,' because a Récollet missionary was drowned there early in the 17th century). A Catholic Iroquois mission village near the mouth of Ottawa r., in Two Mountains co., Quebec, established in 1696 by converts from The Mountain. In 1704 the rest of the Indians at The Mountain removed to the new mission. In 1720 the settlement was abandoned, and the inhabitants, numbering about 900, built a new village at Oka (q. v.). (J. N. B. H.)

Savoyan. A name of the goldthread (Coptis trifoliata) and of certain species of bedstraw (Galium boreale, etc.), which has come into American English through the savoyane of Canadian French. The Indians used the root of Coptis trifoliata to make a yellow dye for their baskets, porcupine-quills, skins, etc. The word is derived from the Algonquian term for the goldthread, represented by the Nipissing-Chippewa atisawaidn, literally meaning 'skin dye,' from atiso, 'to be dyed,' and waidn, 'skin.' (A. F. C.)

Sawagativa (Sa-wa'-ga-ti-ra, 'large hill'). A Paviotso tribe formerly about Winnemucca, N. Nev.—Powell, Paviotso MS., B. A. E., 1881.

Sawamish. A Salish division on Tottem inlet, at the s. end of Puget sd., Wash. Not to be confounded with Samamish.

Sawanogi (Creek form of Shawano, or Shawnee). A former town of Shawnee Indians incorporated with the Creek confederacy, situated on the s. side of Tallapoosa r., in Macon co., Ala. It is mentioned in Bartram's list in 1773, and again by Hawkins in 1799, at which time its people still retained their distinctive language and tribal customs. A few Yuchi were living with them. From a statement by Adair (Am. Inds., 410, 1775) it is probable that they had joined the Creeks about the middle of the 18th century. See Shawnee. (J. M.)

Saway-yanga. A former Gabrieleño rancharia near San Fernando mission, Los Angeles co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 11, 1860.

Sawcunk (Delaware: Sákunk, 'at-the-mouth (of a stream)'). A former important village on the N. bank of Ohio r. near the mouth of Beaver cr., about the site of the present Beaver, Beaver co., Pa. It was a fur-trading station of note, and after the establishment of Ft Duquesne the French erected houses there for the Delaware, Shawnee, and Mingo inhabitants. Sawcunk was the home of Shingass, noted for his hostility toward the frontier settlements. It was abandoned when the English took Ft Duquesne in 1758.

Saws. The aborigines employed primitive forms of the saw in shaping metal, stone, bone, and other hard substances. The chief use, however, was that of dividing portions of the raw material intended for further elaboration. These implements took many forms, and their use involved two distinct processes—one in which the saw employed was harder than the material sawed and was operated by direct abrasion, and the other in which the implement was softer than the material cut, sharp sand being introduced as the abrading agent. The former were usually thin pieces of hard stone, the edges of which were notched by chipping; doubtless other flaked implements, such as knives and spearheads, served on occasion for kindred purposes. Later saws were thin pieces or strips of almost any available material, beneath which the sand was moved back and forth or into the under surfaces of which the grains became imbedded, thus forming a kind of rasp or file. The dividing of masses of the harder stones was of course a tedious process and required great patience, but that the work was effective is shown by many specimens. The cutting of portions of jade for use in the manufacture of adzes and other implements by the natives of Alaska serves to illustrate this. See Stonework. (W. H. H.)

Sayenqueraghta ('Smoke Revanishes,' also known as Old King and Old Smoke). A Seneca chief during the Revolutionary period. His place of residence was on Smoke cr., 5 or 6 m. S. of Buffalo, N. Y. He is first mentioned by Zeisberger in 1750 (Conover, Sayenqueraghta, 2, 1885). His name appears in the treaty of Johnson Hall, N. Y., Apr. 3, 1764; he also figured at the Easton treaty of 1758, and was prominent in most of the conferences of his tribe and of the Six Nations up to 1775. He was speaker in 1774, commanded the Seneca at Oriskany, and led them at Wyoming. Mrs Campbell spoke of him in 1779 as "Guyanguahto, or, as he was commonly called, Grahta, the Seneca King." His death occurred before 1788. Although wielding great influence over his tribe as head-chief, he was not an elected or hereditary chief, but held office at the dictation of the British government and with the willing consent of his people. Scalping. The common name for the Indian practice of removing a portion of the skin, with hair attached, from an enemy's head, for trophy purposes. The word scalp is derived from an old Low German word signifying a shell or sheath. The equivalent word in the various Indian languages commonly refers either to skin or hair.

The practice is not exclusively an Indian one, having been noted among the ancient Scythians as far back as the time of Herodotus. Neither was it common to all the American tribes, as so often supposed. On the contrary, recent researches by Friederici indicate that it was confined originally in North America to a limited area in the E. United States and the lower St Lawrence region, about equivalent to the territory held by the Iroquoian and Muskhogean tribes and their immediate neighbors. It was absent from New England and much of the Atlantic Coast region, and was unknown until comparatively recent times throughout the whole interior and the Plains area. It was not found on the Pacific coast, in the Canadian N. W., or in the Arctic region, or anywhere S. of the United States, with the exception of an area in the Gran Chaco country of South America. Throughout most of America the earlier trophy was the head itself. The spread of the scalping practice over a great part of central and western United States was a direct result of the encouragement in the shape of scalp bounties offered by the colonial and more recent governments, even down to within the last fifty years, the scalp itself being superior to the head as a trophy by reason of its lighter weight and greater adaptability to display and ornamentation.

The operation of scalping was painful, but by no means fatal. The impression that it was fatal probably arises from the fact that the scalp was usually taken from the head of a slain enemy as a token of his death, but among the Plains tribes the attacking party frequently strove to overpower his enemy and scalp him alive, to inflict greater agony before killing him, and frequently also a captured enemy was scalped alive and released to go back thus mutilated to his people as a direct defiance and as an incitement to retaliation. The portion taken was usually a small circular patch of skin at the root of the scalplock just back of the crown of the head. The "scalplock" itself was the small hair braid which hung from the back of the head, as distinguished from the larger side braids. It was usually decorated with beads or other ornaments. When opportunity offered the whole top skin of the head, with the hair attached, was removed, to be divided later into smaller scalplocks for decorating war-shirts, leggings, etc. The operation was performed by making a quick knife stroke around the head of the fallen enemy, followed by a strong tug at the scalplock. The teeth also were sometimes used in the pulling process, and the victor usually knelt with knee pressed down upon the back of his victim stretched face downward. The one who took the scalp was not necessarily the same one who had killed the victim; neither was the number of scalps, but rather of coups (q. v.), the measure of the warrior's prowess. The fresh scalp was sometimes soon afterward offered as a sacrifice to the sun, the water, or some other divinity. In the former case it was held up to the sun, with a short prayer by the owner, and then carefully stretched on a buffalo-chip and thus left on the prairie. When sacrificed to the water the scalp was thrown into the river after a similar prayer. When preserved for a time, as was most usual, the scalp was cleaned of the loose flesh on its under side, and then stretched by means of sinew cords around its circumference within a hoop of about 6 in. diameter, tied at the end of a light rod. When dry the skin side was painted either entirely red, or one half red and the other half black. The hair was carefully rebraided and decorated with various ornaments. It was carried thus by the women in the triumphal scalp dance on the return of the successful war-party to the home camp and then, having served its first purpose, was retained as a bridle pendant by the warrior, deposited with the tribal "medicine," or thrown away in some retired spot.

The many ceremonies, taboos, and beliefs in connection with scalps and scalping are too numerous for treatment within the limits of a brief article. For a discussion of the whole subject the reader should consult Friederici, (1) Skalpieren und ähnliche Kriegsgebräuche in Amerika, Braunschweig, 1906, (2) in Smithson. Rep. 1906, 1907.

The numerous popular misconceptions in connection with the scalping practice may be recapitulated in a series of negatives. The custom was not general, and in most regions where found was not even ancient. The trophy did not include any part of the skull or even the whole scalp. The operation was not fatal. The scalp was not always evidence of the killing of an enemy, but was sometimes taken from a victim who was allowed to live. It was not always taken by the same warrior who had killed or wounded the victim. It was not always preserved by the victor. The warrior's honors were not measured by the number of his scalps. The scalp dance was performed, and the scalps carried therein, not by the men, but by the women. See Hair dressing. (J. M.)

Scandinavian influence. The discovery of Greenland by the Norsemen in 985 A. D. and their occasional voyages southward apparently as far as Nova Scotia, together with their colonization of Greenland for most of the period between 1000 and 1500, form an episode in the pre-columbian period the influence of which on the natives has been confined almost exclusively to the Eskimo of Greenland and the coast of Labrador. It is now the generally accepted belief that the Markland of the Icelandic historians was Newfoundland, and Vineland a part of Nova Scotia. Storm states that he would identify the inhabitants of Vineland with the Indians—Beothuk or Micmac (Reeves, Finding of Wineland the Good, 176, 1895). The long contact of Scandinavian settlers with the Eskimo of Greenland, although having no marked effect on the habits and customs of the latter in the historic era, has had some influence in this direction. The contact began about 1000, and by 1450 the colonies had ceased to make reports to the home country and were forgotten by the civilized world. They were probably exterminated or absorbed by the natives. Rink (Tales and Trad. of Eskimo, 75, 1875) goes so far as to say: "The features of the natives in the southern part of Greenland indicate a mixed descent from Scandinavians and Eskimo, the former, however, not having left the slightest sign of any influence on the nationality or culture of the present natives." Mason (Am. Anthr. xi, 356, 1898) suggests that the well-known skill of the Eskimo in ivory-carving and etching has arisen since contact with the whites, and is due to the introduction of iron; but Boas (Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xv, 367, 1901) considers that the resemblance of Eskimo art to the birch-bark art of the Indians indicates that such origin is impossible, though European influence may account for some of its exuberant development. With the mission of Egede in 1721 began the Christianizing of the Eskimo of the w. coast of Greenland and the institution of schools, charitable and judicial institutions, etc., which have resulted in what is called their civilization (see Missions). Intoxicating liquors have largely been kept from them, but the introduction of firearms has caused deterioration of their ancient skill in fishing and hunting. The adoption of writing, according to some, has impaired the ability of the Eskimo as kaiakers. The abolition of native laws and authority has led, Rink observes, to "a kind of self-abasement and disheartening." Another result of European contact is the tendency to make the houses smaller and the impairment of the power of the head of the family. From the earliest times "Europeans of the working classes have intermarried with native women, and formed their household after the Greenland model, with merely a few European improvements." The presence of a few Scandinavian words, for example, kunia 'wife,' in the jargon of the Pt Barrow Eskimo and whites, is due to Danish rather than to Norse influence. Another Danish loan-word employed in the east may be cited—tupak, 'tobacco.'

Scandinavian influence is represented also by the results of the Swedish settlements in New Jersey during the period 1638–55, after the Swedes had driven out the English colonists and before they were themselves subjected by the Dutch and succeeded by Lutheran missionaries. As the labors of Campanius, Biörck, Hesselius, and others show, the Swedes came into very close contact with the Indians (Nelson, Ind. of New Jersey, 1894), and the American dialect of Swedish adopted several names of plants and animals from the Indian tongues of the region. As Nelson notes (ibid., 77), Biörck's Disseratio Gradualis, published in 1731, contains valuable material bearing on the subject of the religion of the tribes of Delaware r.

Scanonaenrat. A former Huron village situated between Nottawasaga bay and L. Simcoe, Simcoe co., Ontario. It was occupied by the Tohontaenrat, one of the four Huron tribes. The Jesuit mission of St Michel was established there. In 1649, on the overthrow of the Hurons, the Tohontaenrat abandoned their village in a body and were incorporated with the Seneca. (J. N. B. Scarface Charley. A celebrated warrior, best known through his connection with Capt Jack, or Kintpuash, during the Modoc war of 1873. By the natives he was known as Chíkchíkam-Lupalkuelátko, meaning 'wagon scar-faced,' whence the name by which he was known to the whites by reason of a disfigurement caused by his having been run over by a mail stage when a child. Capt Jack spoke of him as a relative, but it is said also that he was a Rogue River Indian of the Tipsoe Tyee (Bearded Chief's) band and joined Capt Jack some years prior to the war of 1873, when 22 years of age. Scarface was among those who taunted Jack when, after the first attack and repulse of the white soldiers, he was disposed to enter into a treaty of peace. When the Modoc became angered during Judge Steele's last visit to them in the lava-beds, Scarface and Capt Jack saved the life of Steele by guarding him during the night; and when Odeneal and Dyar visited the Modoc, Jan. 27, 1873, on behalf of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Scarface would have killed them on the spot had he not been restrained by Jack. He was also the first to fire on the troops when Capt Jackson attempted the arrest of Jack's band on Jan. 28.

Rev Dr Thomas, who was killed in the peace commission massacre, on the day before his death called Scarface Charley the "Leonidas of the lava-beds." He was never known to be guilty of any act not authorized by the laws of legitimate warfare, and entered his earnest protest against the killing of Gen. Canby and Dr Thomas. He led the Modoc against Maj. Thomas and Col. Wright when the troops were so disastrously repulsed with a loss of about two-thirds in killed and wounded. Wearied of the slaughter, he is said to have shouted to the survivors, "You who are not dead had better go home; we don't want to kill you all in a day!" Later he said, "My heart was sick at seeing so many men killed."

Scarface Charley was one of the witnesses called to testify in behalf of the Modoc prisoners during their trial in July following. He was sent with other prisoners successively to Ft D. A. Russell, Wyo., Ft McPherson, Neb., and the Quapaw agency, Ind. Ter., where he died about Dec. 3, 1896. For his portrait, see Modoc.

Scarification. Scarification consists in cutting the skin with any suitable instrument for the purpose of extracting blood, producing suffering, or bringing about a scar. It is known among probably all American tribes from remote antiquity. Its objects were (1) medicinal, a small or a moderate quantity of blood being drawn principally for the purpose of relieving local pain; (2) ceremonial, or emotional; and (3) cosmetic.

Medicinal scarification was widely practised among the Indians of North America from prehistoric times, and was much in favor; it is still observed by some of the tribes of northern and southwestern United States. The ceremonial form, much less common than the medicinal, was practised principally for the purpose of inuring young men to suffering; while emotional scarification was observed, especially among some of the tribes of the plains, of the n.w. coast, and California, by both men and women on the death of a spouse or other near relative. Cosmetic scarifying, allied to tattooing and probably of ceremonial origin, is reported from among the Tlingit of the n. Pacific coast.

The instruments used for scarification were sharp objects, such as knives, arrow-points, chips of stone or obsidian (and later of glass), thorns, porcupine quills, shells, awls, teeth, and finally objects of metal, the material of the implement being determined by the available supply. In exceptional cases the scarifying instrument was of symbolic significance.

Probably all the Indians by whom medicinal scarification was practised recognized the difference between merely scarifying the skin and opening a vein, the latter treatment also being given in some localities. When white physicians first went among the Indians they were often asked to employ bleeding, in the belief that it was of general benefit in almost all cases of illness. Following the scarification, when the blood ceased to flow the wound was usually covered with a substance believed to facilitate healing. On rare occasions the flow of blood from the incision was accelerated by sucking.

Scarouady (Skaron'hi'di', 'on the other side of the sky.'—Hewitt). An Oneida chief, sometimes called Half-King, who came into prominence about the middle of the 18th century. He was known among the Delawares as Monacatuatha, or Monakaduto. He is mentioned as early as 1748, and in 1753 was present at the Carlisle treaty. The following year he succeeded Half-King Scruniyatha in the direction of affairs at Aughwick, Pa. (Pa. Archiv., 1st s., II, 114, 1853), whither he removed from Logstown to escape the influence of the French. On Jan. 7, 1754, he was in Philadelphia, on his way to the Six Nations with a message from the Governor of Virginia, and also by the desire of the Indians of Pennsylvania to ask the former to send deputies to a conference with the Governor. He was with Braddock at the time of his defeat, having made in the preceding May a speech to the Indians at Ft Cumberland urging them to join Braddock in his expedition. In 1756 he seems to have been attending conferences and making speeches, mostly in behalf of peaceful measures, in some of these efforts being joined by Andrew Montour (q. v.). One of his speeches was made July 1, 1756, at the conference of the Six Nations with Sir William Johnson in behalf of the Shawnee and Delawares (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., VII, 148, 1856). Mention is made in the same year of his son who had been taken prisoner by the French and afterward released, and who soon thereafter visited and conferred with Johnson. Scarouady was a firm friend of the English colonists, and as strong an enemy of the French. He was an orator of considerable ability, and was the leading speaker at the numerous conferences he attended. His home was on the Ohio r. in w. Pennsylvania, where he exercised jurisdiction over the western tribes similar to that of Shikellimay over those in central Pennsylvania. (C. T.)

Scaticook. (Properly P'skú'tikuk, 'at the river fork,' here referring to the junction of Ten-mile and Housatonic rs. According to Eunice Mahwee, an aged Scaticook woman, in 1859, a corruption of Mohegan Pishgachtikuk, with the same meaning.) An Indian settlement and reservation on Housatonic r., a few miles below the present Kent, Litchfield co., Conn. It was established by Gideon Mauwehu or Mahwee, a Pequot Indian from the lower Housatonic, who, about the year 1730, removed with a few followers to the present Dover Plains, N. Y., but within a year or two again removed a few miles farther e. and established himself on the Housatonic. Here he invited his old friends of the broken tribes lower down the river to join him, and they did so in considerable numbers, calling the new settlement Scaticook. They were chiefly of the Paugusset, Uncowa, and Potatuc tribes. In 1743 the Moravians, who were at work among the neighboring Mahican of New York, established a mission at Scaticook, which at one time had about 150 baptized converts, but in consequence of difficulties with the white settlers the missions both here and at Shecomeco, of the Mahican tribe, were discontinued in 1746, and the missionaries with many of the converts removed to Pennsylvania. Those from Scaticook wasted by disease in the new location, in consequence of which most of the survivors soon returned to their former settlement; but the mission was not established, and they fell under neglect and poverty. They took no part in the French and Indian war, being too far reduced, as in 1752 they numbered but 18 families. Mauwehn died about 1755. In 1786 they numbered 71, and in 1801 only 35, but the latter figure probably does not include absentees. In 1849 there were only 8 or 10 of full blood and 20 or 30 of mixed blood. In 1903 there remained on the reservation, according to Speck, but one reputed full blood, with 14 others of negro mixture; there were besides a number of others of mongrel breed absent from the reservation. Eunice Mah-wee, the last descendant of the founder, died about 1870. One man only still retained any knowledge of the language a few years ago. They have entirely lost the Indian arts and customs, except for through the settlement there of a body of fugitive Pennacook, Nipmuc, Wampanoag, Narraganset, Pocumtuc, and other refugees from New England, who had been driven out through King Philip's war in 1675. They were soon joined by others, who were encouraged to settle there by the New York authorities, and in 1702 they numbered about 1,000. They had, besides Scaticook, a village near Albany, and were regarded as under the protection of the Mohawk. The Mahican and the immigrant body each preserved its identity. The New York government endeavored to induce the Pennacook at St Francis in Canada to join the Scaticook settlement, while, on the other hand, the French and the St Francis Indians were striving to draw off the Scaticook to Canada. The latter were so far successful that the settlement soon decreased steadily, chiefly through emigration to St Francis and Caughnawaga, until in 1721 not more than 200 persons remained. At the beginning of the French and Indian war these were further reduced to about 50, who joined a party of St Francis Indians in a hostile expedition against the Massachusetts frontier in the year 1754, after which they went with them to Canada.

Schenectady ('on that side of the pinery', referring to the large number of pines formerly growing between Albany and Schenectady). According to Macauley, the Ohnowalagantles, whom he calls a clan of the Mohawk, lived at Schenectady, which was situated about 17 m. W. of Albany, N. Y. He adds that the Schaunactadas, apparently only another form of the name Schenectady, whom he calls a clan of the Mohawk, dwelt along the Hudson at Albany and southwardly. The lands of Schenectady were purchased from the Mohawk by Arent Van Corlaer and others in 1662, and the present city founded. It suffered severely during the later Indian wars, and in 1690 it was attacked by French and Indians and many of its inhabitants were massacred. Ohnowalagantles.—Macauley, Hist. N. Schist. A term applied to fissile and foliated rocks which, although often massive in appearance, split readily in one direction owing to parallel arrangement of the constituent minerals. They are quite variable in composition and are referred to as mica, hornblende, chlorite, or quartz-schist, according to the predominance of the particular mineral. The schists were commonly referred to as slates by early geologists, but the latter term is now confined especially to those varieties that split with considerable regularity. Schists are widely distributed and were extensively used by the native tribes in the manufacture of implements. A majority of the grooved axes and many of the celts, gouges, and other articles, including spear and arrow heads of E. United States, are made of this material. The color is usually gray. In texture the schists are exceedingly varied, but the tribes made use only of the hard and tough varieties. (W. H. H.)

Schoenbrunn (Ger.: 'beautiful spring'). A Moravian town, of Munsee Indians, situated about 2 m. below the site of New Philadelphia, Ohio. Zeisberger went from the station (Friedensstadt), on Beaver r., Pa., to Tuscarawas r., where the three stations of Schoenbrunn, Gnadenhuetten, and Salem were established. The Moravian Indians moved from the Beaver to these villages in 1773. The first meetinghouse and schoolhouse in the present state of Ohio were built at this station, which was also the birthplace of the first white child born within the state. The Indian village was a prosperous settlement. The Revolution brought these villages on the line between the British at Detroit and the Americans at Ft Pitt. In Aug. 1781 De Peyster, the commander at Detroit, becoming convinced that these Indians were giving information of the British movements, sent Capt. Matthew Elliott with a party of Wyandot, Delawares, and Shawnee, and a small band of French-Canadians, to remove these Indians to Sandusky, a task which they performed with great harshness, the Indians being robbed of nearly everything they had. When the Moravians were massacred at Gnadenhuetten (q. v.) in Mar. 1782, the village at Schoenbrunn was burned by the same troop of Pennsylvanians under Col. Williamson. There was also a small settlement on the opposite side of the river called New Schoenbrunn, which was established in 1779 and destroyed in 1782. Consult Loskiel, *Hist. Schoherage. A former Iroquois village, apparently under Oneida jurisdiction, situated, according to the Brion de la Tour

Schohorag6. A former Iroquois village, placed on the w. bank of the Susquehanna, a short distance above Oquaga (q. v.), in New York.—Esnauts and Rappilly Map, 1777.

Schonchin. The recognized head-chief of the Modoc at the time of the Modoc war of 1872-73. In 1846 the Modoc numbered 600 warriors, governed by Schonchin, whose authority seems even then to have been disputed on the ground that he was not an hereditary chief. He took an active part in the early hostilities between the Modoc and the whites, and admitted that he did all in his power to exterminate his enemies. Hostilities were continued at intervals until 1864, when a treaty was made with the Modoc by the provisions of which they agreed to go on a reservation with the Klamath Indians. At this council the Modoc were represented by Schonchin and his younger brother, known as Schonchin John. To the credit of the old chief it is said that after signing the treaty no act of his deserved censure. He went with his people on the land allotted to them, and at the time of the outbreak under Kintpuash (q. v.), or Captain Jack, remained quietly on the reservation in charge of his peaceful tribesmen. His brother John, following Captain Jack, withdrew from the reservation and took up his abode on Lost r., the former home of the tribe. The old chief made every effort to induce Jack to return, but the latter steadfastly refused, on the ground that he could not live in peace with the Klamath. In order to remove every obstacle to the return of the fugitives, the reservation was divided into distinct agencies, a district being set apart exclusively for the Modoc. To this new home old Schonchin was removed with his people, and a portion of Captain Jack's band took up their abode with him. The rest, including Schonchin John, fled to the lava beds, and from this stronghold waged a destructive war. It is believed that Schonchin John, more than any other member of the tribe, was influential in keeping up the strife. He repeatedly advised continuing the fight when Jack would have made peace, and he is considered responsible for many of the inhuman acts committed. In 1873 a peace commission was appointed to deal with the Indians, and a meeting with them was arranged for April 11. To this meeting the Indians agreed to send a number of men equal to that of the commission, and that all should go unarmed.

The commission were divided as to the advisability of keeping the appointment. Commissioners Dyar and Meacham suspected treachery and were of the opinion that it was not safe, while General Canby and Dr Thomas, a Methodist minister, insisted that it was plainly their duty to go. The four commissioners, accompanied by an interpreter and his Indian wife, proceeded to the place of appointment, and, being met by eight Indians, fully armed, it was evident that they had fallen into a trap. The council was opened with brief speeches by Thomas and Canby offering the terms of peace, only to be interrupted by Schonchin John, who angrily commanded, "Take away your soldiers and give us Hot Creek for a home!" Before the commissioners could reply, at a signal from Jack the Indians fell upon the white men. Canby and Thomas were shot to death, Dyar fled and escaped, and Meacham was shot five times by Schonchin John, but finally recovered. As a result of this massacre military operations were resumed with great activity, and after a few severe engagements Jack was dislodged from the lava beds and with his party surrendered on June 1. Gen. Davis decided to hang the leaders forthwith, Schonchin John among the number. While the scaffolds were being prepared word was received from Washington that the condemned men must be tried by a military commission. The prisoners were found guilty of murder and assault to kill, in violation of the rules of war, and sentenced to be hanged, but sentences of two of them were commuted to imprisonment for life. Schonchin John was one of those who were hanged. The execution took place at Ft Klamath, Oct. 3, 1873. In a speech made by Schonchin immediately before his death he declared that his execution would be a great injustice, that his "heart was good," and that he had not committed murder. He asked that his children should be sent to his brother Schonchin, who was still at Yainax on the reservation, and who would "bring them up to be good." Bancroft says that Schonchin John was striking in appearance, with a sensitive face, showing in its changing expression that he noted and felt all that was passing about him. Had he not been deeply wrinkled, though not more than 45 years of age, his countenance would have been rather pleasing. (F. S. N.)

Scrapers. Implements of the scraper class are indispensable adjuncts of the arts of life among primitive peoples. They take varied forms, serve many important purposes, and are made of every available material—animal, vegetal, and mineral. It is observed that although the shapes are often highly specialized, these implements have never risen above the homely realm of the simply useful arts as have some of the implements associated with war and the chase. In their use they have much in common with the knife, the gouge, and the adz, as well as with the abrading implements proper, by the aid of which objects of many kinds were given their final shape and finish. Any sharp-edged stone or fragment of bone, shell, or hard wood could be employed in sharpening or treating materials less refractory than themselves. Stone was of most general application, and fragments and flakes of suitable shape were selected and used or were modified by chipping to increase their effectiveness. The most common form was made from a substantial flake, straight or slightly concave on one side and convex on the other, by removing a few chips around the broad end on the convex side, thus giving a keen, curved scraping edge. Another variety is shaped like a short-bladed spearhead, with stem or notches for hafting, the edge, generally rounded in outline, being either beveled or sharpened equally from both sides. In many cases broken spearpoints and knives were sharpened across the broken end by the removal of a few flakes, giving the necessary scraping edge. These implements were hafted by inserting the stem in the end of a piece of wood or bone, and fixing it with some kind of cement, or by attaching it with cords or thongs to the properly notched end of the handle. With some of the tribes, especially the Eskimo, the handle was elaborated in various artistic ways to fit the hand and to accommodate the thumb and fingers; and on the plains the years of children were recorded by means of tally marks on the handle. Scrapers shaped in part or in whole by pecking and grinding are common. Many of these take the celt or adz form, being beveled after the manner of the latter, with which implement, in both form and use, they imperceptibly blend. Among the uses of the scraper that of dressing hides probably took first place (see Skin-dressing). But its services in shaping many varieties of articles of wood, bone, horn, antler, shell, and soft stone were varied and important.

Scrapers are described, among others, by Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 1888; Fowke in 13th Rep. B. A. E., 1896; Holmes in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 1897; Jones, Antiq. Soc. Inds., 1873; Moorehead, *Prehist. Sculpture and Carving. The sculptural arts in their widest significance may be regarded as including the whole range of the nonplastic shaping arts, their processes and products; but as here considered they relate more especially to the higher phases of the native work, those which rise above the mere utilitarian level into the realm of esthetic expression, thus serving to illustrate the evolution of sculpture the fine art. The shaping arts in nonplastic materials, in their ethnological and technical bearings, are treated under appropriate heads (see, Bone-work, Shell-work, Stone-work, Wood-work). The native tribes n. of Mexico had made very decided progress in the sculptural arts before the arrival of the whites, and in more recent times the tribes of British Columbia and Alaska have produced carvings of very considerable merit. The acquisition of implements of steel has no doubt contributed to the success of this work. The carvings of the Haida, Tlingit, Kwakiutl, and other tribes, in wood, bone, ivory, and slate are remarkable for their artistic qualities and perfection of execution, displaying more than a mere suggestion of the masterly qualities of the prehistoric work of the tribes of Mexico and Central America (Niblack, Boas). A carving in black slate by a member of the Haida tribe, representing the "bear mother" (Swan), is not surpassed in spirit and expression by any known work N. of Mexico. However, like the totem-pole models, masks, rattles, dishes, boxes, and tobacco pipes which excite our admiration, it was executed with steel tools and at a time when the influence of the art of the white man had no doubt come to be somewhat decidedly felt. The Eskimo have exercised their very pronounced genius for realistic carving in ivory and bone, and to some extent in stone and wood. Their representations of animal forms in the round are often admirable, although usually applied to objects that serve some practical purpose (Turner, Boas, Nelson, Murdoch, Hoffman). The Pueblo tribes are not especially accomplished in sculpture, notwithstanding the facts that they stand alone as builders in stone and have exceptional skill and taste in modeling in clay. Their small animal fetiches in several varieties of stone are interesting, but very elementary as works of art, and the human figure, as illustrated by the wooden kachinas of the Hopi, is treated in an extremely primitive manner. The ancient Pueblos were hardly more skillful in these branches (Cushing, Stevenson, Fewkes). The prehistoric sculpture of the Pacific states had barely advanced beyond the elaboration of utensils, although these were often well executed. Worthy of especial attention, however, are certain ape-like heads found in Oregon and Washington, believed by some to represent the seal or sealion rather than any exotic form (Terry). Carvings in wood, stone, bone, horn, and shell, among the historic natives of E. United States, are deserving of slight notice except in so far as they illustrate the very beginnings of sculptural effort. The mound-building tribes of precolumbian times made somewhat ambitious attempts at the portrayal of the human form in the round, and expended much time in the shaping of tobacco pipes in many varieties of hard stone. In these the forms of various quadrupeds, reptiles, and birds were executed in such close approximation to nature that in some cases the species can be recognized with reasonable certainty (Henshaw). In no section, so far as can be determined, was portraiture of the human face very successfully attempted, and the idea of statuary for statuary's sake had probably not been conceived. The life forms shaped were generally the embodiment of mythic personages or beings of importance in the mythology of the people. They are forcefully, but formally or conventionally, presented. It is believed that the native artist drew, modeled, or carved not with the subject before him, but relying upon the traditional conception of the particular subject, the mythological characters being of greater importance to him than the literal or specific rendering of any original. The shortcomings of these sculptures as works of representative art were thus not due to lack of capacity to imitate nature correctly, but resulted rather from the fact that exact imitation of nature was not essential to the native conception of the requirements of the art (Squier and Davis, Schoolcraft, Henshaw, Thomas). The carvings in bone and shell of these tribes present few art features of particular interest, excepting in the designs which were engraved on gorgets and other forms of personal ornaments.

STONE PIPE, OHIO. HEIGHT, 2 IN.

Technologically considered, sculpture includes all representative work in the round and in relief of all degrees, the lower forms connecting with the bolder phases of the engraver's art (see Engraving). In the period before the arrival of the whites the shaping processes employed implements of stone chiefly, but copper and bone were employed to some extent. These tools, however, were more efficient than those unacquainted with their operation would at first imagine. The brittle materials were shaped by fracturing with stone hammers and by pressure with implements of bone or horn. Hard and tough stones were reduced by pecking with stone hammers and by sawing and drilling with wood and bone or copper tools, aided by fine sand, but soft stones, such as steatite, were cut with stone saws, chisels, and knives. The forms were elaborated and specialized by grinding and finished by rubbing. (See Art.)

Native sculpture is referred to and somewhat fully illustrated in numerous works: Ann. Archaeol. Rep. Ontario, 1888-1906; Boas in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., ix, 1897; xv, pt. 1, 1901; Cushing

Scuppernong. The name of a small and unimportant river in Tyrrell co., N. C., raised from obscurity through the application of its name to a whitish grape (a variety of Vitis rotundifolia, Michx., the muscadine grape; the messamin of Capt. John Smith), discovered near Columbia (the county seat), on its E. shore, in the 18th century, by two men named Alexander. This variety, which subsequently became somewhat famous as a table and wine grape, was called at first the "white grape" by its discoverers, who afterward changed the name, owing to its indefiniteness, to that of the river on which it was found. The name of the river (which is also that of the lake in which it has its source) was originally the Indian designation of the swampy land along its borders, viz, āskūp'onong, 'at (or in) the place (or country) of the āskūpo,' the Southern Algonquian name of the Magnolia glauca, a small tree growing in swamps (or "bays," as magnolia swamps are called in North Carolina) from New Jersey to Florida, and popularly known as sweet bay, swamp bay, swamp sassafras, bay laurel, etc. This species of magnolia is the tree that Capt. Arthur Barlow in his account of Wokokon id. (1584) refers to as "the tree that beareth the rine [rind] of blacke sinamon," and compares to another magnolia now known as Drimys Winteri; and that Thomas Hariot, in his Brief and True Report (1588), mentions under the Indian name of ascopo, and likens to the "cassia lignea" (Canella alba) of the West Indies. Seattle (properly Seathl). A chief of the Dwamish and allied tribes of Puget sd., Wash.; born perhaps about 1790, died on Port Madison res., in the same neighborhood, June 7, 1866. He was the first signer of the Port Elliott treaty of 1855, by which the Puget sd. tribes submitted to agency restrictions. In the general outbreak of 1855–58 he maintained a friendly attitude. Through the efforts of the French missionaries he became a Catholic and inaugurated regular morning and evening prayers in his tribe, which were continued by his people after his death. In appearance he is described as dignified and venerable, with a bearing reminding one somewhat of Senator Benton. The town of Seattle was named from him, and in accordance with local Indian belief that the mention of a dead man's name disturbs the rest of the spirit, the old man was accustomed to levy a small tribute on the citizens as compensation in advance. A monument was erected over his grave by the people of Seattle in 1890. See Bancroft, Hist. Wash., Idaho and Mont., 1890; Ind. Aff. Rep. 1904, 357, 1905. (J. M.)

Seccasaw.—Smith (1629), Va., II, 183, repr. 1819. Seccasaw.—Smith (1616) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., VI, 108, 1837.

Seccherpoga (probably intended for Lutchapoga). Mentioned by Webb (H. R. Doc. 80, 27th Cong., 3d sess., 47, 1843) as a band of Indians living in Florida; they doubtless formed part of the Seminole tribe.

Secharlecha (Sidshálidsha, 'under a blackjack [Quercus Catesbei] tree.'—Gatschet). A former Lower Creek settlement where a council of the Lower Creeks was held in Nov. 1832; not otherwise known. Secharlecha.—Seale in H. R. Doc. 452, 25th Cong., 2d sess., 50, 1838. See-char-litch-ar.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, IV, 579, 1854.

Sechi. A Kawia village in Cahuilla valley, s. Cal. Agua Caliente, one name for this place, has been extended to designate a reservation, Agua Caliente No. 2, which comprises 3,844 acres of patented desert land, on which there were 31 Indians in 1903 under the San Jacinto agency, and 43 in 1909 under the Malki school superintendency.

Rep., XII, 521, 1880 (probably the correct identification, the author being evidently wrong in placing the people he refers to, in Los Angeles co., where there are no Kawia).

Sechukhtun (Se-tuq'-tún). A former village of the Chastacosta on Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 234, 1890.

Secmoco (Sek-mo-ko'). A tribe represented at San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas, between 1730 and 1741. The parents of an adult gentile woman baptized there in 1730 were a Secmoco and a Papanac (Valero Bautismos, 1730, 1737, 1741, MS.). Cf. Sinicu. (H. E. B.)

Secmose.—Valero Bautismos, op. cit., 1737 (identical?) Sepuncó.—Ibid., 1730.

Secobec. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, on the s. bank of the Rappahannock, in Caroline co., Va.

Secobeck.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Seconchut. A village on Marthas Vineyard, off the coast of Massachusetts, in 1698.—Doc. of 1698 in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., x, 131-132, 1809.

Secotan (apparently a substantive meaning 'burned place,' from a verb signifying 'it burns'; cf. Secatong.—Gerard). An Algonquian tribe occupying in 1584 the peninsula between Albemarle sd. and lower Pamlico r., with the adjacent islands, the territory now embraced in Washington, Tyrrell, Dare, Beaufort, and Hyde cos., N. C. In later times the same territory was occupied by the Machapunga, Pamlico, and Hatteras, who may have been the descendants of the Secotan. From the statements of White, who accompanied the early Raleigh expeditions, these Indians were of medium stature; they dressed in loose mantles of deerskin, and wore summer aprons of the same about the loins, in front only on the men, but before and behind on the women. The men cut their hair close on the sides of the head, leaving a crest from the forehead back to the neck; that of the women, being comparatively short, thin, and soft, was clipped in front. The arms, legs, and cheeks of the women and parts of the body of the men were tattooed to a limited extent. The Secotan believed in the immortality of the soul and in numerous deities called "Mantoac [i.e. man'touk, pl. of manito, the first mention of the word in English], but of different sortes and degrees; one onely chiefe and great God, which hath bene from all eternitie." Their towns are described as small, and near the seacoast but few; some containing 10 or 12 houses, some 20, the greatest seen having but 30. Some of these were inclosed "with barks of trees made fast to stakes, or els with poles onely fixed upright and close one by another." Their houses were oblong and consisted of a framework of poles set in the ground and lashed with cross-pieces; the roof was rounded, covered with bark or rush mats. The Secotan people were comparatively well advanced in agriculture, cultivating not only maize, of which they had three varieties, but two leguminous plants which the English called peas and beans, and melons, pumpkins, gourds, etc. They drew a large part of their subsistence from the waters, being expert fishermen, spearing fish, and also capturing them in "a kind of wear made of reedes, which in that country are very strong." For synonyms, see the village, following. (J. M.)

Secotan. The chief Secotan village in the 16th century, situated on the N. bank of Pamlico r. in the present Beaufort co., N. C. For an illustration from White's drawing, see Habitations.

Assamacomoe.—Raleigh (1589) quoted by Martin, N. C., I, 33, 1829 (perhaps a corruption of Dasamonquepeuc). Secota.—De Bry, map (ca. 1585) in Hawks, N. C., I, 1859. Secotan.—Barlowe (1584), ibid., 87. Sequotan.—Ibid., 86. Sicopan.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, VI, 92, 1857 (misprint). Wangadacea.—Martin, N. C., I, 78, 1859 (said by Raleigh to mean "you wear good clothes," the reply of the natives to questions of the English and mistaken by them for the name of the country). Wingandagoa.—Strachey (1612), Va., 143, 1849. Winginana.—Rafinesque in Marshall, Ky., introd., I, 36, 1824. Winginas.—Ibid., 27.

Secowocomoco. A former Algonquian tribe or subtribe of Maryland, living on Wicomico r. in St Mary and Charles cos. In 1608 their village was on the E. bank of Wicomico r. at its junction with the Potomac in St Mary co., and was estimated to contain 50 warriors. They are distinct from the Wicomoco. They are the tribe among whom the first Maryland colonists landed and made their primary settlement. At that time (1634) they had their village on St Marys r., but soon afterward abandoned it, nominally for the benefit of the English, but more likely on account of the frequent inroads of the Conestoga. It is probable that this and other small tribes in this section of Maryland formed parts of or were closely connected with the Conoy. In 1651 they with other tribes were removed to a reservation at the head of Wicomico r.

According to White (Relatio Itineris) they were very tall and well proportioned; they painted their faces dark blue above the nose and red below, or the reverse. Their hair was gathered in a knot at the left ear and fastened with a band. Their houses were built "in an oblong oval shape." Their chief deity was named Ochre, and they also paid a kind of adoration to corn and fire. For subsistence they depended largely on agriculture.

Cecomocomoco.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819 (misprint). Secowocomoco.—Ibid., 118. Wicomocoans.—Bozman, Md., II, 421, 1837. Yaocomico.—White (ca. 1634), Relatio Itineris, 36, 1874 (apparently the chief's name). Yaocomoco.—Ibid. Yaomacoa.—Shea misquoting Bozman in Alsop, Md., 119, note, 1880. Yoamaco.—Harris, Voy. and Trav., II, 259, 1705. Yoamacoa.—Bozman, Md., II, 29, 1837.

Secret societies. Societies or brotherhoods of a secret and usually sacred character existed among very many American tribes, among many more, doubtless, than those from which there is definite information.

On the Plains the larger number of these were war societies, and they were graded in accordance with the age and attainments of the members. The Buffalo society was a very important body devoted to healing disease. The Omaha and Pawnee seem to have had a great number of societies, organized for all sorts of purposes. There were societies concerned with the religious mysteries, with the keeping of records, and with the dramatization of myths, ethical societies, and societies of mirth-makers, who strove in their performances to reverse the natural order of things. We find also a society considered able to will people to death, a society of "big-bellied men," and among the Cheyenne a society of fire-walkers, who trod upon fires with their bare feet until the flames were extinguished.

According to Hoffman the Grand Medicine society, or Midewiwin, of the Chipewa and neighboring tribes, was a secret society of four degrees, or lodges, into which one could be successively inducted by the expenditure of a greater and greater amount of property on the accompanying feasts. As a result of these initiations the spiritual insight and power, especially the power to cure disease, was successively increased, while on the purely material side the novitiate received instruction regarding the medicinal virtues of many plants. The name of this society in the form medeu occurs in Delaware, where it was applied to a class of healers. In the neighborhood of New York bay there was a body of conjurers who "had no fixed homes, pretended to absolute continence, and both exorcised sickness and officiated at the funeral rites." Their name is interpreted by Brinton to mean "Great Snake," and they participated in certain periodical festivals where "a sacrifice was prepared, which it was believed was carried off by a huge serpent."

In the S. W. each Pueblo tribe contains a number of esoteric societies, which mediate between men and the zoö-morphic beings of Pueblo mythology. At Zuñi there are 13 of these societies, and they have to do especially with healing, either collectively in their ceremonies or through individual members. They also endeavor to bring rain, but only by means of the influence which the beast gods are able to exert over the anthropic beings who actually control it. Rain-bringing itself is properly the function of the rain priests and of the Kótikilli society, the latter consisting of Zuñi of the male sex, and occasionally some females. Admission to this is necessary in order that one may have access after death to the dance-house of the anthropic gods. There are six divisions of the Kótikilli, holding their ceremonies in as many kivas corresponding to the six world-quarters, and in their performances members wear masks representing the anthropic beings, which they are then supposed actually to embody, although they sing to them at the same time in order to bring showers. The Rain priesthood and the Priesthood of the Bow are considered under the caption Shamans and Priests, but they may be classed also as brotherhoods concerned respectively with rain-making and war (see Stevenson in 23d Rep. B. A. E., 1905).

At Sia the Society of the Cougar presides over hunting, and there is also a Warrior society. Parents apply to have their children admitted into a society, or a person who has been cured by the society may afterward be taken in. A person may belong to more than one society, and most of the societies also consist of two or more orders, the most important "being that in which the members are endowed with the anagogics of medicine."

Since the Hopi clans have been shown by Fewkes to have been originally independent local groups, the secret society performances among them would appear to be nothing more than the rituals of the various groups, the societies themselves being the members of the groups owning such rituals and certain others that have been granted a right to participate. The principal war society, however, has resulted from a fusion of the warriors or war societies of all the clans of the Hopi pueblos except one. Besides the two war societies, and two societies devoted to the curing of diseases, all of these brotherhoods devote themselves to bringing rain and stimulating the growth of corn. Each is headed by a chief, who is the clan chief as well and the oldest man in his clan, and contains several subordinate chiefs, while the oldest woman of the clan occupies a conspicuous place.

The Californian Maidu had a society into which certain boys chosen by the old men were annually admitted. The societies were called Yëponi, and included all the men of note in the tribe. "The ceremonies were more or less elaborate, involving fasts, instruction in the myths and lore of the tribe by the older men, and finally a great feast and dance at which the neophytes for the first time performed their dances, which were probably received through visions." (Dixon, Maidu Myths, 1902.) Each village or group of villages commonly had a separate branch of the society under a leader called Huku, who was one of the most important personages in the place, being frequently called upon to settle disputes that could not otherwise be composed, lead a war-party, or determine when the people should go to gather acorns. He was usually a shaman also, and was then considered more powerful than any other, for which reason he was looked to, to make rain, insure good supplies of acorns and salmon, keep his people in good health, and destroy their enemies by means of diseases. He was the keeper of a sacred cape made of feathers, shells, and pieces of stone, which was made for him by the previous leader and would kill anyone else who touched it. He was appointed by the most noted shaman in the society, who pretended that he had been instructed in a dream, and usually held office as long as he chose, though he might be deposed. Powers quotes a local authority to the effect that there was a secret society among the Pomo which conjured up infernal horrors for the purpose of "keeping their women in subjection," and they are also said to have had regular assembly houses, but the account of this society is evidently garbled and distorted.

The sense of supernatural as distinguished from purely secular relationships received its logical recognition among the Kwakiutl of the coast of British Columbia in a division of the year into a sacred and a profane period, during each of which the social organization and along with it personal appellations of the tribe changed completely. In the first place, a distinction was made between present members of the secret societies, called "seals," and the quiquatan, those who were for the time being outside of them. These latter were furthermore divided, in accordance with sex, age, and social standing, into several bodies which received names generally referring to animals.

The "seals," on the other hand, were subdivided into societies in accordance with the supernatural beings supposed to inspire the various members. All of those whose ancestors had had an encounter with the same supernatural being were thus banded together, and, since only one person might represent each ancestor, the number in a society was limited, and one might join only on the retirement of a member. Every secret society had its own dances, songs, whistles, and cedar-bark rings. The right to a position in a secret society might be acquired by killing a person of some foreign tribe and taking his paraphernalia, or for one's son by marrying the daughter of him who possessed it. At the time of initiation the novice was supposed to be carried away for a season by the spirit which came to him, and after his return he usually went through the different houses in the town accompanied by other members of the society who had been initiated previously. In case his spirit were a violent one, he might break up boxes, canoes, etc., which the giver of the feast had to replace. The most important part of these societies were the ones inspired by the cannibal spirit, the origin of which has been traced by Boas to the Heiltsuk tribe and to customs connected with war.

From the Kwakiutl and Heiltsuk these secret society dances spread northward and southward. The Nootka are said to have had two principal secret society performances, the Dukwally (i. e. lū'koula), or Thunder-bird ceremony, supposed to have been obtained from the wolves, and the Tsáyeq (Kwakiutl Ts'ā'eqa), or Tsiakh, into which a patient was initiated when the shaman had not succeeded in curing him. According to Swan the latter was performed after the patient had seen a dwarfish spirit with long, yellowish hair and four horns on his head who promised relief if the ceremonies were performed.

The Songish of British Columbia have two societies called Tciyī'wan and Xanxani'tal, obtained from the Nootka. The first is open to anybody and consists of five subordinate societies. That to which a man belongs depends on the dream he has after retiring into the woods. Unlike the other, only rich people can become members of the Xanxani'tal, as heavy payments are exacted for initiation. The Xanxani'tal novice also obtains his guardian spirit in the woods, after which he performs his first dance with masks and cedar-bark ornaments. Among the coast Salish of Fraser valley is found a brotherhood or society called Sqoiaqī, which enjoys special prerogatives and possesses certain emblems and dances. Bellacoola secret societies are closely bound up with the festivals and the tribal organization. They are of two varieties, the Sisaúk, obtained from a being of that name who resides in the sun, and the Kū'siut, which were derived from a female spirit who lives in a cave in the woods and comes out only in winter when the feasts are about to be held. He who sees her has to invite people to dance the Kū'siut. There are several different societies or degrees of this, however, corresponding to the highest ones among the Kwakiutl. The dances, masks, etc., used at such times, and only then, seem to be the special property of the different clans, but right to wear them has to be acquired by the individuals.

The Tsimshian societies were all received from the Heiltsuk through Kitkatla, but according to Niska tradition they were obtained by the former from a man who went to live among the bears. There are said to have been five or six of these societies among the latter people, and the number of places in each was limited. The performances were similar to those seen among the Kwakiutl, except that they were not so elaborate.

The Haida have had secret societies only during the last 100 or 150 years. The entire performance consisted in the supposed possession of the novice by some one of a number of spirits, who carried the youth away and made him act the way the spirit himself was supposed to act. Some of these ways of acting were introduced, while others were in accordance with native conceptions. They were largely the property of certain chiefs who would allow only their own families to use them. Among the Tlingit the societies appear to have been employed in a very similar manner, but with the northern Tlingit they had barely made their appearance.

Seechelt (Sí'ciatl). A Salish tribe on Jervis and Seechelt inlets, Nelson id., and the s. part of Texada id., Brit. Col. They speak a distinct dialect and are thought by Hill-Tout on physical grounds to be related to the Lillooet. Anciently there were 4 divisions or septs—Kunechin, Tsonai, Tuwanek, and Skaiakos—but at present all live in one town, called Chatelech, around the mission founded by Bishop Durieu, who converted them to Roman Catholicism. The Kunechin and Tsonai are said to be of Kwakiutl lineage. Pop. 236 in 1902, according to the Canadian Department of Indian Affairs, and 325 according to Hill-Tout. The former authority gives 244 in 1909. (J. R. S.)

Sekani ('dwellers on the rocks'). A group of Athapascan tribes living in the valleys of upper Peace r. and its tributaries and on the w. slope of the Rocky mts., Brit. Col. Morice says they were formerly united into one large tribe, but on account of their nomadic habits have gradually separated into smaller distinct tribes having no affiliation with one another. Harmon (Jour., 190, 1820) said that they came from E. of the Rocky mts., where they formed a part of the Tsattine. Gallatin (Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., II, 20, 1836) gave their habitat as the headwaters of Peace r. Dunn (Hist. Oreg., 79, 1844) located them in the mountains near Nahannir. Wilkes (U. S. Explor. Exped., IV, 451, 1845) said they ranged about Ft Simpson, E. of the Taculli and beyond the Rocky mts. McLean (Hudson's Bay, I, 235, 1849) found some at McLeod lake in 1849. Richardson (Arct. Voy., II, 31, 1851) placed them between Stikine and Skeena rs. Taylor (Cal. Farmer, July 19, 1862) described them as being in the mountains between McLeod and Connolly lakes. According to Hind (Labrador Penin., II, 261, 1863) they inhabited the foot of the Rocky mts. N. W. of Peace r. and a part of New Caledonia W. of the Rocky mts., resorting to Fts Dunvegan, Halkett, and Liard. Pope (MS., B. A. E.) located them W. of Tatlah lake, Brit. Col. Petitot (Dict. Dènè-Dindjié, XX, 1876) said that most of them were near the trading posts on Fraser r., a small number only frequenting the Peace and Liard, where they have a reputation for great savageness. Morice (Proc. Canad. Inst., 112, 1889) says they roam over the Rocky mts. on both slopes and the adjacent forests and plains from about 54° to 60° N. They are of much slighter build and shorter in stature than any of the neighboring tribes, from whom they otherwise differ but little except that their bands are numerous and not closely organized socially. Morice describes them as slender and bony, in stature below the average, with narrow forehead, prominent cheek-bones, small, deeply sunk eyes, the upper lip very thin, the lower protruding, the chin very small, and the nose straight. Fathers appear like children, and none are corpulent and none bald. Petitot describes them as built like Hindus, light of color, with fine black almond eyes, large and of oriental limpidity, firm noses, the mouth large and voluptuous. Many of the males are circumcized. The women wear rings in their noses. These people are very barbarous and licentious. Their complete isolation in the Rocky mts. and their reputation for merciless and cold-blooded savagery cause them to be dreaded by other tribes. Their manner of life is miserable. They do without tents, sleeping in brush huts open to the weather. Their only clothing consists of coats and breeches of mountain-goat or bighorn skins, the hair turned outside or next to the skin according to the season. They cover themselves at night with goat-skins sewed together, which communicate to them a strong odor, though less pungent than the Chipewyan receive from their smoked elk skins. Petitot (Autour du lac des Esclaves, 309, 1891) pronounces them the least frank and the most sullen of all of the Tinné. They are entirely nomadic, following the moose, caribou, bear, lynx, rabbits, marmots, and beaver, on which they subsist. They eat no fish and look on fishing as an unmanly occupation. Their society is founded on father-right. They have no chiefs, but accept the council of the oldest and most influential in each band as regards hunting, camping, and traveling (Morice, Notes on W. Dénés, 28, 1893). When a man dies they pull down his brush hut over the remains and proceed on their journey. If in camp, or in the event of the deceased being a person of consequence, they make a rough coffin of limbs and erect a scaffolding for it to rest on, covering it usually with his birch-bark canoe inverted; or, on the death of an influential member of the tribe, a spruce log may be hollowed out for a coffin and the remains suspended therein on the branches of trees. Sometimes they hide the corpse in an erect position in a tree hollowed out for the purpose. They keep up the old practice of burning or casting into a river or leaving suspended on trees the weapons and clothing of the dead person. When a member of the band was believed to be stricken with death they left with him what provisions they could spare and abandoned him to his fate when the camp broke up. They are absolutely honest. A trader may go on a trapping expedition, leaving his store unlocked without fear of anything being stolen. Natives may enter and help themselves to powder and shot or any other articles they require out of his stock, but every time they leave the exact equivalent in furs (Morice).

Morice (Trans. Can. Inst., 28, 1893) divides the Sekani into 9 tribes, each being composed of a number of bands having traditional hunting grounds the limits of which, unlike those of their neighbors, are but vaguely defined. It is not uncommon for them to trespass on the territory of one another without molestation, an unusual custom among the tribes of the N. W. The tribes are as follows: (1) Yutsutkenne, (2) Tsékehneaz, (3) Totatkenne, (4) Tsatkenne (Tsattine), (5) Tsetautkenne, (6) Sarsi, (7) Saschutkenne, (8) Otzenne, (9) Tselone. Besides these there is an eastern division, the Thekkane.

Can. Inst., 200B, 1889) said that in 1888 there were 78 near Ft Liard and 73 near Ft Halkett, making 151 in the Mackenzie r. region. Morice (Proc. Can. Inst., 113, 1889) said that they numbered 500 in 1887, not more than 250 of them being in British Columbia. The same authority (Notes on W. Dénés, 16, 1893) estimated the total population of the Sekani group at 1,300; the Sekani proper, on both sides of the Rocky mts., numbering 500, the Tsattine 700, and the Sarsi 100. In 1909 the Sarsi (q. v.) alone were officially reported to number 197.

Al-ta-tin.—Dawson in Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., 192B, 1887. Lhtaten.—Morice in Proc. Can. Inst., 118, 1889 ('inhabitants of beaver dams': applied also to Nahane). T'tat'tenne.—Morice, Notes on W. Dénés, 29, 1893 ('people of the beaver dams': Takulli name.) Rocky Mountain Indians.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, map, 35, 1882. Sékanais.—Petitot in Jour. Roy. Geog. Sekhatsatunne (Se-qa'-ts'ä junnè). A former village of the Chastacosta, on the N. bank of Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 234, 1890.

Sekhushtuntunne (Se-güc-tün junnè, 'people at the big rocks'). A band of the Mishikhwutmetunne formerly living on Coquille r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 232, 1890.

Sekumne (Se-kum'-ne). A former Maidu village on the right bank of American r., about 10 m. above Sacramento, Cal.

Lacomnis.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860. Secumnes.—Hale, Ethnol. and Philol., 631, 1846. Secumni.—Latham in Proc. Philol. Soc. Lond., VI, 79, 1854. Sekamne.—Hale, op. cit., 222. Sekomne.—Hale misquoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 450, 1874. Sekume.—Latham, Opuscula, 313, 1870. Sekumne.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., XVII, pt. 3, pl. 38, 1905. Sekúmne.—Hale, op. cit., 631, Secumnes.—Ibid., 630.

Selawigmiut. A tribe of Alaskan Eskimo living on Selawik lake, e. of Kotzebue sd., Alaska. They numbered 100 in 1880.

Chilivik.—Zagoskin, Descr. Russ. Poss. Am., i, 74, 1847. Seelawik Mutes.—Kelly, Arct. Eskimos, chart, 1890. Selawigamute.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 4, 1884. Selāwig'mūt.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 12, 1877. Silawī'āmīun.—Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 44, 1892. Sulawig-meuts.—Hooper, Cruise of Corwin, 26, 1881.

Seldovia (Russian: 'herring'). A Kaniagmiut Eskimo village on the s. side of Kachemak bay, w. coast of Kenai penin., Alaska. Pop. 74 in 1880; 99 in 1890. (Petroff, 10th Census, Alaska, 29, 1884.)

Selelot (Sel'élōt). A Squawmish division living on Burrard inlet, coast of British Columbia.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Selenite. See Gypsum.

Seluxa. A former Seminole town at the head of Ocilla r., probably in Madison co., Fla.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Selikwayi (Seli'wā'yī). A Cherokee settlement, about the time of the removal of the tribe to the W. in 1839, on Sallacoa cr., probably at or near the present Sallacoa, Cherokee co., s. w. Ga. The name is that of a small green snake, and of a tall broad-bladed grass bearing a fancied resemblance to it. (J. M.)

Sallicoah.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887.

Selkuta (Sel-ku'-ta). A Bellacoola village on the n. side of the mouth of Bellacoola r., Brit. Col.—Boas in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., ii, 49, 1898.

Sels ('food-steamers'). The name applied, probably contemptuously, to a Haida family of low social rank which formed a subdivision of the Hlgahetgulanās. It is related that the people of this family were so much in the habit of steaming food that one of their women once said, "We shall be called 'food-steamers'"; and so it happened. Low-class people in other families seem to have received the same name.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 270, 1905.

Seltsas (Selts'ā's). A Katsey summer village at the head of Pitt lake, which drains into lower Fraser r., Brit. Col.—Boas in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 454, 1894.

Semeckamenee. See Sewackenaem.

Semehan (SEMERā'u, 'little lynx'). A village of the Spences Bridge band of Ntlakyapamuk on the n. side of Thompson r., 32 m. from Lytton, Brit. Col.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., ii, 173, 1900.

Semiahmoo. A Salish tribe living about the bay of the same name in n. w. Washington and s. w. British Columbia. In 1843 they numbered 300, and in 1909 there were 38 of the tribe on the Canadian side.

Birch Bay.—Farnham, Trav., 111, 1843. Samam-hoo.—Can. Ind. Aff., 308, 1879. Semiahmoo.—Wilson in Jour. Ethnol. Soc. Lond., 278, 1866. Semi-ā'mō.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes, Can., 10, 1889. Sem-mi-an-mas.—Fitzhugh in Ind. Aff. Rep., 1857, 328, 1858. Shimiahmoo.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., i, 433, 1855. Simiahmoo.—Gibbs, Clallam and Lummi, 6, 1863. Simiamo.—Tolmie and Dawson, Vocabs. Brit. Col., 119B, 1884. Skim-i-ah-moo.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., i, 436, 1855.

Seminole (Creek: Sim-a-na'-le, or Isti simanōle, 'separatist', 'runaway'). A Muskogean tribe of Florida, originally made up of immigrants from the Lower Creek towns on Chattahoochee r., who moved down into Florida following the destruction of the Apalachee (q. v.) and other native tribes. They were at first classed with the Lower Creeks, but began to be known under their present name about 1775. Those still residing in Florida call themselves Ikaniúksalgi, 'peninsula people' (Gatschet).

The Seminole, before the removal of the main body to Indian Ter., consisted chiefly of descendants of Muscogee (Creeks) and Hitchiti from the Lower Creek towns, with a considerable number of refugees from the Upper Creeks after the Creek war, together with remnants of Yamasee and other conquered tribes, Yuchi, and a large negro element from runaway slaves. When Hawkins wrote, in 1799, they had 7 towns, which increased to 20 or more as they overran the peninsula.

While still under Spanish rule the Seminole became involved in hostility with the United States, particularly in the War of 1812, and again in 1817–18, the latter being known as the first Seminole war. This war was quelled by Gen. Andrew Jackson, who invaded Florida with a force exceeding 3,000 men, as the result of which Spain ceded the territory to the United States in 1819. By treaty of Ft Moultrie in 1823, the Seminole ceded most of their lands, excepting a central reservation; but on account of pressure from the border population for their complete removal, another treaty was negotiated at Paynes Landing in 1832, by which they were bound to remove beyond the Mississippi within 3 years. The treaty was repudiated by a large proportion of the tribe, who, under the leadership of the celebrated Osceola (q. v.), at once prepared for resistance. Thus began the second Seminole war in 1835, with the killing of Emathla, the principal signer of the removal treaty, and of Gen. A. R. Thompson, who had been instrumental in applying pressure to those who opposed the arrangement. The war lasted nearly 8 years, ending in Aug. 1842, with the practical expatriation of the tribe from Florida for the W., but at the cost of the lives of nearly 1,500 American troops and the expenditure of $20,000,000. One incident was the massacre of Maj. F. L. Dade's command of 100 men, only one man escaping alive. The Seminole negroes took an active part throughout the war.

Those removed to Oklahoma were subsequently organized into the "Seminole Nation," as one of the so-called Five Civilized Tribes. In general condition and advancement they are about on a level with their neighbors and kinsmen of the Creek Nation. In common with the other tribes they were party to the agreement for the opening of their lands to settlement, and their tribal government came to an end in Mar. 1906. In 1908 they were reported officially to number 2,138, largely mixed with negro blood, in addition to 986 "Seminole freedmen." A refugee band of Seminole, or, more properly, Seminole negroes, is also on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande in the neighborhood of Eagle Pass, Texas.

The Seminole still residing in the s. part of Florida, officially estimated at 358 in 1900, but reduced to about 275 in 1908, remain nearly in their original condition. Within the last few years the Government has taken steps to secure to them a small permanent reservation to include their principal settlements. In general characteristics they resemble the Creeks, from whom they have descended. The best account of their present status is that of MacCauley in the 5th Rep. B. A. E., 1887. Sempoapi (Sem-po-a-pi). The Tewa name of a ruined Tano pueblo of the compact, communal type, situated near Golden, Santa Fé co., N. Mex. According to Bandelier (Ritch, N. Mex., 201, 1885; Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 108, 1892) it was abandoned probably in 1591 on account of a raid by other Indians.

Sená'tahá.—Gatschet, Uchee MS., B. A. E., 70, 1885 (= 'bird clan').

Senap. See Sannup.

Senasqua (equivalent of Delaware lenaskqual, 'original grass,' i. e. grass which was supposed to have grown on the land from the beginning.—Ruttenber). A former Kitchawank fortified village on Hudson r., at the mouth of Croton r., in Westchester co., N. Y. It may be identical with Kitchawank village.—Ruttenber (1) Tribes Hudson R., 79, 1872, (2) Ind. Geog. Names, 29, 1906.

Senatuch. Mentioned by Grant (Jour. Roy. Geog. Soc., 293, 1857) as a Nootka tribe on the S. W. coast of Vancouver id.

Seneca ('place of the stone,' the Anglicized form of the Dutch enunciation of the Mohegan rendering of the Iroquoian ethnic appellative Oneida, or, strictly, Oněniute'á'ká', and with a different ethnic suffix, (měniute'ron'non', meaning 'people of the standing or projecting rock or stone'). A prominent and influential tribe of the Iroquois (q. v.). When first known they occupied that part of W. New York between Seneca lake and Geneva r., having their council fire at Tsonontowan, near Naples, in Ontario co. After the political destruction of the Erie and Neuters, about the middle of the seventeenth century, the Seneca and other Iroquois people carried their settlements westward to L. Erie and southward along the Alleghany into Pennsylvania. They also received into their tribe a portion of these conquered peoples, by which accessions they became the largest tribe of the confederation and one of the most important. They are now chiefly settled on the Alleghany, Cattaraugus, and Tonawanda res., N. Y. A portion of them remained under British jurisdiction after the declaration of peace and live on Grand River res., Ontario. Various local bands have been known as Buffalo, Tonawanda, and Cornplanter Indians; and the Mingo, formerly in Ohio, have become officially known as Seneca from the large number of that tribe among them. No considerable number of the Seneca ever joined the Catholic Iroquois colonies.

In the third quarter of the 16th century the Seneca was the last but one of the Iroquois tribes to give its suffrage in favor of the abolition of murder and war, the suppression of cannibalism, and the establishment of the principles upon which the League of the Iroquois was founded. However, a large division of the tribe did not adopt at once the course of the main body, but, on obtaining coveted privileges and prerogatives, the recalcitrant body was admitted as a constituent member in the structure of the League. The two chiefships last added to the quota of the Seneca were admitted on condition of their exercising functions belonging to a sergeant-at-arms of a modern legislative body as well as those belonging to a modern secretary of state for foreign affairs, in addition to their duties as federal chieftains; indeed, they became the warders of the famous "Great Black Doorway" of the League of the Iroquois, called Ka'no'hwádjí'gō'ná' by the Onondaga.

In historical times the Seneca have been by far the most populous of the five tribes originally composing the League of the Iroquois. The Seneca belong in the federal organization to the tribal phratry known by the political name Hofñdofñis'hě'n', meaning, 'they are clansmen of the fathers,' of which the Mohawk are the other member, when the tribes are organized as a federal council; but when ceremonially organized the Onondaga also belong to this phratry (see Government). In the federal council the Seneca are represented by eight federal chiefs, but two of these were added to the original six present at the first federal council, to give representation to that part of the tribe which had at first refused to join the League. Since the organization of the League of the Iroquois, approximately in the third quarter of the 16th century, the number of Seneca clans, which are organized into two phratries for the performance of both ceremonial and civil functions, have varied. The names of the following nine have been recorded: Wolf, Hoñnat'huuñ'at'; Bear, Hodidjioñu'gā'; Beaver, Hodigēn'gegū'; Turtle, Hadiniā'diā'; Hawk, Hadi-shurēn'gāin'; Sandpiper, Hod'nc'siū', sometimes also called Snipe, Plover, and Killdeer; Deer, Hadinuñ'gāin'; Doe, Hadiñuñ'degū', sometimes Hoñuñ'gāidjē'; Heron, Hodiduiñ'gā'. In a list of clan names made in 1838 by Gen. Dearborn from information given him by Mr. Cone, an interpreter of the Tonawanda band, the Heron clan is called the Swan clan with the native name given above. Of these clans only five had an unequal representation in the federal council of the League; namely, the Sandpiper, three, the Turtle, two, the Hawk, one, the Wolf, one, and the Bear, one.

A SENECA

One of the earliest known references to the ethnic name Seneca is that on the Original Carte Figurative, annexed to the Memorial presented to the States-General of the Netherlands, Aug. 18, 1616, on which it appears with the Dutch plural as Sennecas. This map is remarkable also for the first known mention of the ancient Erie, sometimes called Gahkwah or Kahkwah; on this map they appear under the name last cited, Gachoi (ch = kh), and were placed on the N. side of the W. branch of the Susquehanna. The name did not originally belong to the Seneca, but to the Oneida, as the following lines will show.

In the early part of Dec. 1634, Arent Van Curler (or Corlaer), the commissary or factor of the Manor of Rensselaerwyck (his uncle's estate), set out from Ft. Orange, now Albany, N. Y., in the interest of the fur-trade, to visit the Mohawk and the Siunekens. Strictly speaking, the latter name designated the Oneida, but at this time it was a general name, usually comprising the Onondaga, the Cayuga, and the Seneca, in addition. At that period the Dutch and the French commonly divided the Five Iroquois tribes into two identical groups; to the first, the Dutch gave the name Maquas (Mohawk), and to the latter, Siunekens (Seneca, the final -ens being the Dutch genitive plural), with the connotation of the four tribes mentioned above. The French gave to the latter group the general name "les Iroquois Supérieurs", "les Huronnois d'en haut", i. e. the Upper Iroquois, "les Huronnois des pays plus hauts, nommés Sontouaheronnons" (literally, 'the Iroquois of the upper country, called Sontouaheronnons'), the latter being only another form of "les Teonnons" tonans" (the Seneca); and to the first group the designations "les Iroquois inférieurs" (the Lower Iroquois), and "les Huronnois d'en bas, nommés Aguechron-

SENECA WOMAN, THE DAUGHTER OF GEN. C. S. PARKER

nons" (the Mohawk; literally, 'the Iroquois from below, named Agnechronons'). This geographical rather than political division of the Iroquois tribes, first made by Champlain and the early Dutch at Ft Orange, prevailed until about the third quarter of the 17th century. Indeed, Governor Andros, two years after Greenhalgh's visit to the several tribes of the Iroquois in 1677, still wrote, "Ye Oneidas deemed ye first nation of sineques." The Journal of Van Curler, mentioned above, records the interesting fact that during his visit to the tribes he celebrated the New Year of 1635 at a place called Ennequttehage or Sinnekens. The first of these names was the Iroquois, and the second, the Mohegan, name for the place, or, preferably, the Mohegan translation of the Iroquois name. The Dutch received their first knowledge of the Iroquois tribes through the Mohegan. The name Ennequttehage is evidently written for Onñĩute'agā'ge', 'at the place of the people of the standing (projecting) stone.' At that date this was the chief town of the Oneida. Van Curler's Journal identifies the name Sinnekens with this town, which is presumptive evidence that it is the Mohegan rendering of the Iroquois local name Onñĩute', 'it is a standing or projecting stone', employed as an ethnic appellative. The derivation of Sinnekens from Mohegan appears to be as follows: a'sinni, 'a stone, or rock', -ika or -iga, denotive of 'place of', or 'abundance of', and the final -ens supplied by the Dutch genitive plural ending, the whole Mohegan synthesis meaning 'place of the standing stone'; and with a suitable pronominal affix, like o- or wĩ-, which was not recorded by the Dutch writers, the translation signifies, 'they are of the place of the standing stone.' This derivation is confirmed by the Delaware name, W'tassone, for the Oneida, which has a similar derivation. The initial w- represents approximately an o-sound, and is the affix of verbs and nouns denotive of the third person; the intercalary -t- is merely euphonic, being employed to prevent the coalescence of the two vowel sounds; and it is evident that assone is only another form of a'sinni, 'stone', cited above. Hence it appears that the Mohegan and Delaware names for the Oneida are cognate in derivation and identical in signification. Heckewelder erroneously translated W'tassone by 'stone pipe makers.'

Thus, the Iroquois Onñĩute'ā'gā', the Mohegan Sinnekens, and the Delaware W'tassone are synonymous and are homologous in derivation. But the Dutch, followed by other Europeans, used the Mohegan term to designate a group of four tribes, to only one of which, the Oneida, was it strictly applicable. The name Sinnekens, or Sennecaus (Visscher's map, ca. 1660), became the tribal name of the Seneca by a process of elimination which excluded from the group and from the connotation of the general name the nearer tribes as each with its own proper native name became known to the Europeans. Obviously, the last remaining tribe of the group would finally acquire as its own the general name of the group. The Delaware name for the Seneca was Mexaxtin'ni (the Maechachtinni of Heckewelder), which signifies 'great mountain'; this is, of course, a Delaware rendering of the Iroquois name for the Seneca, Djiionōdowānēñ'ākā', or Djiionōdowānēñ'roñ'noñ', 'People of the Great Mountain.' This name appears disguised as Trudamani (Cartier, 1534-35), Entouhonorons, Chouontouaroion = Chouontouaronon (Champlain, 1615), Ouentouaronens (Champlain, 1627), and Tsonontouan or Sonontouan (Jes. Rel., passim).

Previous to the defeat and despoliation of the Neuters in 1651 and the Erie in 1656, the Seneca occupied the territory drained by Genesee r., eastward to the lands of the Cayuga along the line of the watershed between Seneca and Cayuga lakes.

The political history of the Seneca is largely that of the League of the Iroquois, although owing to petty jealousies among the various tribes the Seneca, like the others, sometimes acted independently in their dealings with aliens. But their independent action appears never to have been a serious and deliberate rupture of the bonds uniting them with the federal government of the League, thus vindicating the wisdom and foresight of its founders in permitting every tribe to retain and exercise a large measure of autonomy in the structure of the federal government. It was sometimes apparently imperative that one of the tribes should enter into a treaty or other compact with its enemies, while the others might still maintain a hostile attitude toward the alien contracting party.

During 1622 the Montagnais, the Algonkin, and the Hurons sought to conclude peace with the Iroquois (Yroquois = Mohawk division?), because "they were weary and fatigued with the wars which they had had for more than 50 years." The armistice was concluded in 1624, but was broken by the continued guerrilla warfare of the Algonkin warriors; for this reason the Seneca ("Ouentouoronons d'autre nation, amis desdits Yrocois") killed in the "village of the Yrocois" the embassy composed of a Frenchman, Pierre Magnan, and three Algonquian ambassadors. This resulted in the renewal of the war. So in Sept. 1627, the Iroquois, including the Seneca, declared war against the Indians and the French on the St Lawrence and its northern affluents by sending various parties of warriors against them.

From the Jesuit Relation for 1635 (p. 34, 1858) it is learned that the Seneca, after defeating the Hurons in the spring of 1634, made peace with them. The Hurons in the following year sent an embassy to Sonontouan, the chief town of the Seneca, to ratify the peace, and while there learned that the Onondaga, the Oneida, the Cayuga, and the Mohawk were desirous of becoming parties to the treaty.

In 1639 the war was renewed by the Hurons, who in May captured 12 prisoners from the Seneca, then regarded as a powerful people. The war continued with varying success. The Jesuit Relation for 1641 (p. 75, 1858) says the Seneca were the most feared of the enemies of the Hurons, and that they were only one day's journey from Ongniaahra (Niagara), the most easterly town of the Neuters. The Relation for 1643 (p. 61) says that the Seneca (i. e. "les Hiroquois d'en haut"), including the Cayuga, the Oneida, and the Onondaga, equaled, if they did not exceed, in number and power the Hurons, who previously had had this advantage; and that the Mohawk at this time had three villages with 700 or 800 men of arms who possessed 300 arquebuses that they had obtained from the Dutch and which they used with skill and boldness. According to the Jesuit Relation for 1648 (p. 49, 1858), 300 Seneca attacked the village of the Aondironnons, and killed or captured as many of its inhabitants as possible, although this people were a dependency of the Neuters who were at peace with the Seneca at this time. This affront nearly precipitated war between the Iroquois and the Neuters.

The Seneca warriors composed the larger part of the Iroquois warriors who in 1648-49 assailed, destroyed, and dispersed the Huron tribes; it was likewise they who in 1649 sacked the chief towns of the Tionontati, or Tobacco tribe; and the Seneca also took a leading part in the defeat and subjugation of the Neuters in 1651 and of the Erie in 1656. From the Journal des PP. Jésuites for 1651-52 (Jes. Rel., Thwaites' ed., xxxvii, 97, 1898) it is learned that in 1651 the Seneca, in waging war against the Neuters, had been so signally defeated that their women and children were compelled to flee from Sonontowan, their capital, to seek refuge among the neighboring Cayuga.

In 1652 the Seneca were plotting with the Mohawk to destroy and ruin the French settlements on the St Lawrence.

Two years later the Seneca sent an embassy to the French for the purpose of making peace with them, a movement which was probably brought about by their rupture with the Erie. But the Mohawk not desiring peace at that time with the French, perhaps on account of their desire to attack the Hurons on Orleans id., murdered two of the three Seneca ambassadors, the other having remained as a hostage with the French. This act almost resulted in war between the two hostile tribes; foreign affairs, however, were in such condition as to prevent the beginning of actual hostility. On Sept. 19, 1655, Fathers Chaumonot and Dablon, after pressing invitations to do so, started from Quebec to visit and view the Seneca country, and to establish there a French habitation and teach the Seneca the articles of their faith.

In 1657 the Seneca, in carrying out the policy of the League to adopt conquered tribes upon submission and the expression of a desire to live under the form of government established by the League, had thus incorporated eleven different tribes into their body politic.

In 1652 Maryland bought from the Minqua, or Susquehanna Indians, i. e. the Conestoga, all their land claims on both sides of Chesapeake bay up to the mouth of Susquehanna r. In 1663, 800 Seneca and Cayuga warriors from the Confederation of the Five Nations were defeated by the Minqua, aided by the Marylanders. The Iroquois did not terminate their hostilities until famine had so reduced the Conestoga that in 1675, when the Marylanders had disagreed with them and had withdrawn their alliance, the Conestoga were completely subdued by the Five Nations, who thereafter claimed a right to the Minqua lands to the head of Chesapeake bay.

In 1744 the influence of the French was rapidly gaining ground among the Seneca; meanwhile the astute and persuasive Col. Johnson was gradually winning the Mohawk as close allies of the British, while the Onondaga, the Cayuga, and the Oneida, under strong pressure from Pennsylvania and Virginia, sought to be neutral.

In 1686, 200 Seneca warriors went w. against the Miami, the Illinois in the meantime having been overcome by the Iroquois in a war lasting about five years. In 1687 the Marquis Denonville assembled a great horde of Indians from the region of the upper lakes and from the St Lawrence—Hurons, Ottawa, Chippewa, Missisauga, Miami, Illinois, Montagnais, Amikwa, and others—under Durantaye, DuLuth, and Tonti, to serve as an auxiliary force to about 1,200 French and colonial levies, to be employed in attacking and destroying the Seneca. Having reached Irondequoit, the Seneca landing-place on L. Ontario, Denonville built there a stockade in which he left a garrison of 440 men. Thence advancing to attack the Seneca villages, he was ambushed by 600 or 800 Seneca, who charged and drove back the colonial levies and their Indian allies, and threw the veteran regiments into disorder. Only by the overwhelming numbers of his force was the traitorous Denonville saved from disastrous defeat.

In 1763, at Bloody Run and the Devil's Hole, situated on Niagara r. about 4 m. below the falls, the Seneca ambushed a British supply train on the portage road from Ft Schlosser to Ft Niagara, only three escaping from a force of nearly 100. At a short distance from this place the same Seneca ambushed a British force composed of two companies of troops who were hastening to the aid of the supply train, only eight of whom escaped massacre. These bloody and harsh measures were the direct result of the general unrest of the Six Nations and the western tribes, arising from the manner of the recent occupancy of the posts by the British, after the surrender of Canada by the French on Sept. 8, 1760. They contrasted the sympathetic and bountiful paternalism of the French régime with the neglect and niggardliness that characterized the British rule. Such was the state of affairs that on July 29, 1761, Sir Wm. Johnson wrote to General Amherst: "I see plainly that there appears to be an universal jealousy amongst every nation, on account of the hasty steps they look upon we are taking towards getting possession of this country, which measures, I am certain, will never subside whilst we encroach within the limits which you may recollect have been put under the protection of the King in the year 1726, and confirmed to them by him and his successors ever since and by the orders sent to the governors not to allow any one of his subjects settling thereon . . . but that it should remain their absolute property." But, by the beginning of the American Revolution, so well had the British agents reconciled them to the rule of Great Britain that the Seneca, together with a large majority of the people of the Six Nations, notwithstanding their pledges to the contrary, reluctantly espoused the cause of the British against the colonies. Consequently they suffered retribution for their folly when Gen. Sullivan, in 1779, after defeating their warriors, burned their villages and destroyed their crops.

There is no historical evidence that the Seneca who were on the Ohio and the s. shore of L. Erie in the 18th and 19th centuries were chiefly an outlying colony from the Iroquois tribe of that name dwelling in New York. The significant fact that in historical times their affiliations were never with the Iroquois, but rather with tribes usually hostile to them, is to be explained on the presumption that they were rather some remnant of a subjugated tribe dependent on the Seneca and dwelling on lands under the jurisdiction of their conquerors. It is a fair inference that they were largely subjugated Erie and Conestoga. Regarding the identity of these Indians, the following citation from Howe (Hist. Coll. Ohio, II, 574, 1896) is pertinent: "The Senecas of Sandusky—so-called—owned and occupied 40,000 acres of choice land on the e. side of Sandusky r., being mostly in this [Seneca] and partly in Sandusky co. Thirty thousand acres of this land was granted to them on the 29th of September, 1817, at the treaty . . . of Maumee Rapids. . . . The remaining 10,000 acres, lying s. of the other, was granted by the treaty at St Mary's, . . . 17th of September, 1818." By the treaty concluded at Washington Feb. 28, 1831, these Seneca ceded their lands in Ohio to the United States and agreed to emigrate s. w. of Missouri, on Neosho r. The same writer states that in 1831 "their principal chiefs were Coonstick, Small Cloud Spicer, Seneca Steel, Hard Hickory, Tall Chief, and Good Hunter, the last two of whom were their principal orators. The old chief Good Hunter told Henry C. Brish, their subagent, that this band [which numbered 390 in 1908] were in fact the remnant of Logan's tribe, . . . and says Mr Brish in a communication to us: 'I cannot to this day surmise why they were called Senecas. I never found a Seneca among them. They were Cayugas—who were Mingoes—among whom were a few Oneidas, Mohawks, Onondagas, Tuscarawas, and Wyandots.'" The majority of them were certainly not Cayuga, as Logan was Conestoga or Mingo on his maternal side.

In 1677 the Seneca had but four villages, but a century later the number had increased to about 30. The following are the better known Seneca towns, which, of course, were not at all contemporary. Canadasaga, Canandaigua, Caneadea, Catherine's Town, Cattaraugus, Chemung, New Chemung, Old Chemung, Chenango, Cheronderoga, Chinoshageh, Condawhaw, Connewango, Dayoitgao, Deonundagae, Deyodeshot, Deyohnegano, Deyonongdadagana, Dyosyowan, Gaandowanang, Gadaho, Gahato, Gahayanduk, Ganagweh, Ganawagus, Ganeasos, Ganedontwan, Ganogeh, Ganondasa, Ganos, Ganosagong, Gaonsagaon, Gaousage, Gaskosada, Gathsegwarohare, Geneseo, Gistaquat, Gwaugweh, Honeoye, Joneadih, Kanagaro (3), Kanaghsaws, Kannas-sarago, Kashong, Kaskonchiagon, Kaygen, Keinthe, Newtown, Oatka, Ongniahra, Onnahee, Onoghsadago, Onondarka, Owaiski, Sheshequin, Skahasegao, Skoiyase, Sonojowauga, Tekisedaneyont, Tioniongarunte, Tonawanda, Totiakton, Tsonontowanen, Yorkjough, Yoroowago.

The earliest estimates of the numbers of the Seneca, in 1660 and 1677, give them about 5,000. Later estimates of the population are: 3,500 (1721); 1,750 (1736); 5,000 (1765); 3,250 (1778); 2,000 (1783); 3,000 (1783), and 1,780 (1796). In 1825 those in New York were reported at 2,325. In 1850, according to Morgan, those in New York numbered 2,712, while about 210 more were on Grand River res. in Canada. In 1909 those in New York numbered 2,749 on the three reservations, which, with those on Grand r., Ontario, would give them a total of 2,962. The proportion of Seneca now among the 4,071 Iroquois at Caughnawaga, St Regis, and Lake of Two Mountains, Quebec, can not be estimated.

Seneca (I'sú'nigá, not translatable, but it has no relation to the Iroquois tribal name). A former important Cherokee settlement on Keowee r., about the mouth of Conneross cr., in Oconee co., S. C. Hopewell, the country seat of General Pickens, where the famous treaty was made in 1785, was near it, on the E. side of the river.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 522, 1900.

Sennekaw.—Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1887. Sinica.—Bartram, Travels, 372, 1792

Seneca Town. A former village of Mingos, occupied by the remnant of Logan's band, situated on the E. side of Sandusky r., in Seneca co., Ohio, probably opposite Ft. Seneca, established during the war of 1812. It was on a tract of 40,000 acres in Seneca and Sandusky cos., 30,000 acres of which were granted the "Senecas of Sandusky," so called, by treaty of Sept. 29, 1817, and 10,000 acres by treaty of Sept. 17, 1818. By treaty of Feb. 28, 1831, these Indians ceded their Ohio lands to the United States and removed to the Neosho r., Ind. Ty.

Senecu (Se-ne-ku', probably from Tzen-o-cué, which was perhaps the aboriginal name.—Bandelier). A former pueblo of the Piro, 13 m. below Socorro, N. Mex., on the w. bank of the Rio Grande, at the site of the present village of San Antonio. It was the seat of the Spanish mission of San Antonio de Senecú founded in 1629 by Fray Antonio de Arteaga and Fray García de Zúñiga, or de San Francisco (who died at El Paso and was buried at Senecu in 1673), and contained the first church and monastery erected on the lower course of the Rio Grande in New Mexico. Regarding the fate of the village, Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 250, 1892) says: "On the 23d of Jan. 1675, the Apaches surprised the pueblo of Senecu, killed its missionary, Fray Alonzo Gil de Avila, and slaughtered so many of the inhabitants of all ages and both sexes that the survivors fled in dismay to Socorro, and the pueblo remained forever deserted." Not to be confounded with the Senecu (see Senecu del Sur) below El Paso, in Chihuahua, which was settled about 1680 by fugitive Piro and Tigua from New Mexico, some of them being from the older Senecu. See also Piros; Pueblos. (F. W. H.)

Senecu del Sur (Span.: 'Senecu of the South'). A pueblo on the s. e. bank of the Rio Grande, a few miles below El Paso, in Chihuahua, Mexico, inhabited by the last remnant of the Piro and Tigua who escaped from Senecu. N. Mex., during an Apache outbreak in 1675, or who were taken there from Isleta, Socorro, and Alamillo by Gov. Otermin on his retreat from Santa Fé during the Pueblo revolt of 1680. The mission of San Antonio was established there in 1682. The natives have practically lost their language and are almost completely "Mexicanized." (F. W. H.)

Senedo. According to Peyton (Hist. Augusta Co., 6, 1882), a tribe formerly on the n. fork of Shenandoah r., Va., and exterminated by the Southern Indians in 1732. The statement is of doubtful authenticity. (J. M.)

Senega. The "Seneca snakeroot" (Polygala senega), from which the Indians, and after them the whites, prepared a remedy for snake bites, etc.; from Seneca, the name of one of the Five Nations of the Iroquois. The siniga of Cherokee is probably the same word. (A. F. C.)

Senestun (Se-nēs'-tún). A band or village of the Chastacosta on Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 234, 1890.

Senijextee. A Salish tribe formerly residing on both sides of Columbia r. from Kettle falls to the Canadian boundary; they also occupied the valley of Kettle r., Kootenay r. from its mouth to the first falls, and the region of the Arrow lakes, Brit. Col. In 1909 those in the United States numbered 342, on the Colville res., Wash.

Senikave. A Kaviagmiut Eskimo village on the mainland opposite Sledge id., Alaska.—11th Census, Alaska, 162, 1893.

Senisos (Span., probably referring either to ceniza, 'ashes,' or to cenizo, the white goose-foot, a plant). A former tribe in N. E. Mexico, probably Coahuiltecan, which was drawn from Nuevo Leon and in 1698 gathered into mission San Antonio Galindo Moctezuma, n. of Monclova.

Cenizos.—Revillagigedo, Carta, MS., quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 611, 1886.

Senkti (SenxL). A Bellacoola village near the mouth of Bellacoola r., Brit. Col., "about 1 m. above Nuxa'lk'!"

Senqtl.—Boas in 7th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 3, 1891. SENXL.—Boas in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 49, 1900. Snihtlimih.—Tolmie and Dawson, Vocabs. Brit. Col., 122B, 1884 (perhaps refers to Snū't'ele, another town; mih = 'people of').

Sennenes. A Costanoan division or village in California.—Engelhardt, Franciscans in Cal., 331, 1897.

Senobe. See Sannup.

Sentethltun (Sēn-tēcl-tún). A former village of the Tututni on the s. side of Rogue r., Oreg. Schumacher (Bull. Geol. Surv., 31, 1877) placed it at the mouth of Rogue r., making its inhabitants a part of the Tshemetunne.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 236, 1890.

Sepasoot. A former band called Munsee, but probably a part of the Wappinger, on the e. bank of Hudson r., at Rhinebeck, Westchester co., N. Y.—Schoolcraft in Proc. N. Y. Hist. Soc., II, 103, 1844.

Sepawi. A pueblo formerly occupied by the Tewa in the valley of El Rito cr., on the heights above the Ojo Caliente of Joseph, and 5 m. from the Mexican settlement of El Rito, n. N. Mex. Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 61, 1890; IV, 51 et seq., 1892) regards its ruin as the largest in New Mexico.

Sepawn. See Supawn.

Se ping. The Painted Eagle clan of the Tewa pueblo of San Juan, N. Mex.

Sepi'-tdōa.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 350, 1896 (tdōa = 'people').

Sepon. See Supaim.

Sepori. A former Pima settlement in Arizona, s. of Gila r., probably near the Sonora boundary. It contained 80 families in 1871.

Sepori.—Rudo Ensayo (ed. 1783), 162, 1863. Sepori.—Ibid., 193. Topony.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1871, 265, 1872 (misprint).

Sequalliser. See Saguarosero.

Sequan. A small Diegueño band in Sweetwater canyon, 20 m. from San Diego, s. Cal.; pop. 50 in 1883, 35 in 1891. The name is now given to a reservation of 640 acres, largely of non-arable land, 110 m. from Mission Tule River Agency, with 34 people in 1909.

Sequan.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong. 3d sess., 133, 1857. Sequan. Jackson and Kinney, Rep. Mission Inds., 28, 1883. Byenan.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 11, 72, 1891. Syquan.—Ibid., 1902, 175, 1903.

Sequarsosa, Sequaresoro. See Saghuarsosa.

Sequarsosero. An Onondaga chief who joined in a message to Pennsylvania in 1753, was at a treaty in Montreal in 1756, and a council at Ft Johnson, N. Y., in 1757. In Aug. 1759 he was mentioned at Oswego as old Saquerisera, an Onondaga sachem. He signed the treaty negotiated at Ft Stanwix in 1768, and his name appears in Weiser's list, under the form Achseyquarrosery, of those in authority in 1752 (Minutes Prov. Coun. Pa., v, 686, 1852 56). In 1750 Cammerhoff called him Sequalliser. (Cf. Saghuarsosa, Sakarissu. (W. M. B.)

Sequidongques. A famous Seneca chief of the period of the American Revolution, called also Little Beard, and living at Little Beard's town, now Cuylerville, Livingston co., N. Y. His successor inherited both names, and the two can not always be distinguished. Their names appear on the treaties of 1790, 1797, 1815, and 1826, in various forms, as Shecanach-weschegue, Saherquianlongui, Sigwah-soligwih, Checanadughtwo, etc. The Indian name may belong to the later chief alone, who is described as having been below the medium height, and a fluent speaker. (W. M. B.)

Sequim. A Clallam village on Squim bay or Port Washington, s. w. Wash. In 1887 Ellis stated that there were about 40 Indians there, mostly old people.

Sequoia. The big tree (Sequoia gigantea) or the redwood (S. sempervirens) of California: from Sequana (q. v.), the inventor of the Cherokee alphabet, whose name in the Cherokee language is Sikedyt. From the needles of the sequoia is distilled "sequoienne". (A. F. C.)

Sequoya. Inventor of the Cherokee alphabet, born in the Cherokee town of Taskigi, Tenn., about 1760; died near San Fernando, Tamaulipas, Mexico, in Aug. 1843. He was the son of a white man and a Cherokee woman of mixed blood, daughter of a chief in Echota. Besides his native name of Sikwayi, or Sequoya, he was known as George Gist, otherwise spelled Guest or Guess, the patronymic of his father, generally believed to have been a German trader. He has also been claimed as the son of Nathaniel Gist of Revolutionary note. Sequoya grew up in the tribe, quite unacquainted with English or civilized arts, becoming a hunter and trader in furs. He was also a craftsman in silverwork, an ingenious natural mechanic, and his inventive powers had scope for development in consequence of an accident that befell him in hunting and rendered him a cripple for life. The importance of the arts of writing and printing as instruments and weapons of civilization began to impress him in 1809, and he studied, undismayed by the discouragement and ridicule of his fellows, to elaborate a system of writing suitable to the Cherokee language. In 1821 he submitted his syllabary to the chief men of the nation, and on their approval the Cherokee of all ages set about to learn it with such zeal that after a few months thousands were able to read and write their language. Sequoya, in 1822, visited Arkansas to introduce writing in the Western division of the Cherokee, among whom he took up his permanent abode in 1823. Parts of the Bible were printed in Cherokee in 1824, and in 1828 The Cherokee Phoenix, a weekly newspaper in Cherokee and English (see Periodicals), began to appear. Sequoya was sent to Washington in 1828 as an envoy of the Arkansas band, in whose affairs he bore a conspicuous part, and when the Eastern Cherokee joined the old settlers in the W. his influence and counsel were potent in the organization of the reunited nation in Indian Ter. When, in his declining years, he withdrew from active political life, speculative ideals once again possessed his mind. He visited tribes of various stocks in a fruitless search for the elements of a common speech and grammar. He sought also to trace a lost band of the Cherokee that, according to tradition, had crossed the Mississippi before the Revolution and wandered to some mountains in the W., and while pursuing this quest in the Mexican sierras he met his death. See Mooney, Myths of the Cherokee, 19th Rep., B. A. E., 108 et seq., 147, 148, 1900, and the authorities therein cited.

Sequoia League. An association incorporated "to make better Indians;" named in honor of Sequoya, the "American Cadmus," and founded as a national organization with headquarters in Los Angeles, Cal., in 1902, by Charles F. Lummis, in consultation with other persons throughout the country. The first work of the league was to secure the appointment of the Warner's Ranch Commission, which procured a model reservation for 300 Mission Indians evicted from their home under decision of the U. S. Supreme Court. The league also secured revocation, by the President, of the "hair-cut order" and secured several vital reforms in agency administration in the S. W. More recently (1904) the league, through the Los Angeles council, has supplied clothing, bedding, seed grain, and ten months' rations to the Mission Indians of the five Campo reservations in San Diego co., Cal., and has organized a concerted movement for the purchase, by the Government, of adequate lands for these Indians, who have been practically destitute for 40 years. It has also carried to headquarters the case of the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico, who were in danger of losing, through a scheme of taxation, the lands given them by the Crown of Spain and respected through all the vicissitudes of Spanish-American rule. The aim of the Sequoya League is to organize public opinion to aid the Department of the Interior; to present reliable information as to conditions in the field; and by proper influence on legislators to secure legislation with regard to the Indians. (C. F. L.)

Serecoutecha. A village mentioned by Joutel as N. or N. W. of the Maligne (Colorado) r., Texas, in 1687. The name seems to have been given to him by the Ebahamo Indians, who were probably affiliated with the Karankawa. The locality was controlled generally by Tonkawan tribes. Possibly the Terocodames of the Spaniards. (A. C. F.)

Sereoutecha.—Charlevoix, New France, Shea ed., IV, 78, 1870. Sereoutecha.—Joutel, Journal, Eng. trans., 90, 1719. Serecoutecha.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., III, 289, 1878. Tsepchoen frerouteas.—Barcia, Ensayo, 271, 1723 (=Tsepcoen and Serecoutecha).

Seredka (Russian: 'middle'). A former Aleut village on a bay of that name in Akun id., E. Aleutians, Alaska. Pop. 16 in 1834.

Sayraidneuskoi.—Elliott, Cond. Aff. Alaska, 225, 1875. Seredkinakoje.—Holmberg, Ethnog. Skizz., map, 1855. Seredninakoe.—Veniaminoff, Zapiski, II, 202, 1840.

Sermiligak. The northernmost known village of the northern group of East Greenland Eskimo, situated on Sermiligak fjord, lat. 65° 45'.—Rink in Deutsche Geog. Blätt., VIII, 351, 1885.

Sermilik. The most southerly village of the northernmost group of East Greenland Eskimo, situated on Sermilik fjord, lat. 65° 40'.—Rink in Deutsche Geog. Blätt., VIII, 349, 1885.

Serpent. See Snake Dance.

Serpentine. A magnesium silicate, of greatly varying texture and color, much used by the native tribes in the manufacture of ornaments, tobacco pipes, and ceremonial objects. It is too soft for making effective implements, but in California it was much employed in the manufacture of small vessels. It is usually greenish in color, although reddish, brownish, and grayish hues and mottled effects are common. The distribution is wide and the deposits are extensive. (W. H. H.)

Serpent Mound. A remarkable earthwork representing a serpent and usually designated the Great Serpent Mound; situated on Brush cr., in the extreme northern part of Adams co., Ohio. For an illustration, see Mounds. The first description and figure of this ancient work were published by Squier and Davis in 1848 (Anc. Mon., 96-98, pl. xxxv). It was subsequently repeatedly described and figured after what was given by Squier and Davis, until a new drawing and description by MacLean appeared in 1885 (Am. Antiq., VII, 44-47), and by Holmes in 1886 (Science, VIII, Dec. 31). The mound is on the middle line of a narrow, crescent-shaped spur, about 100 ft high, flanked on one side by Brush cr. and on the other by East cr. Commencing with the head, which is at the very point of the spur and is partially obliterated, and proceeding toward the tail, one comes first to an enlargement, suggestive of the enlarged neck of a cobra; this is formed by an outer wall on each side, beginning at the small head and uniting in the rear. Within is an inner wall inclosing a small oval space. On each side of the outer wall, about the middle, is an opening or gateway, and back of the interior oval is a slightly curved cross wall, extending from one side to the other. From the union of the two outer walls to the tip of the tail the serpent body is represented by a single embankment, fairly uniform in size, though diminishing gradually toward the tip, having serpentine bends, and ending with a coil of two complete turns. The height of the embankment before restoration under the auspices of the Peabody Museum varied from 2 to 3½ ft, and probably never exceeded 4 ft. The entire length, from the point of the head to the end of the tail, following the curves and bends, as measured by MacLean, is 1,330 ft; the width varies from 15 to 20 ft. The length of the oval, as given by Squier and Davis, is 160 ft, and its width 80 ft. In the middle is a low mound, about 15 ft in diameter, which has been partially excavated, revealing stones in the center, some of which appear to have been burned. The serpent form is so accurately imitated as to leave no doubt that it was the object of the builders to represent this reptile. "Beginning with a small pit at the terminal point, we follow the unfolding coil for two full turns, and then advance along the body to its highest point on the ridge. The curves are strong and even, and the body increases gradually in height and width as we advance. Upon the crest of the ridge we find ourselves at the beginning of three great double folds. Following these, we descend into a slight sag . . . and ascend again slightly to a point where the body straightens out along the ridge. Beyond this we reach the curious enlargement with its triangular and oval enclosures" (Holmes). There is nothing to be found to indicate the legs of MacLean's frog or the winglike projections of Squier and Davis's figure. The most reasonable suggestion respecting the enlargement and the oval is that of Holmes: "When we restore the neck and head of the reptile, omitted by Squier and Davis and misinterpreted by others, the strange oval takes the position of the heart, and in all probability marks the site of the ceremonies that must have been connected with this work."

The land on which the Serpent Mound is situated was purchased for the Peabody Museum; fences were built, trees planted, and defaced portions of the artificial work restored and sodded. In 1900 the trustees of Harvard College deeded the property to the Ohio Archeological and Historical Society, to which it now belongs. The most accurate drawing is that by Holmes, above referred to, also reproduced in the 12th Rep. B. A. E., 493, 1894. See Thomas, Cat. Prehist. Works, 161, 1891, with bibliography; Reps. Peabody Museum, 1899-1900, et seq.; Randall, Serpent Mound, 1905. (C. T.)

Serper. A Yurok village on Klamath r., N. W. Cal., about 25 m. below the mouth of the Trinity, or 5 m. below Klamath P. O.

Sehe-perrh.—Gibbs (1851) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 138, 1853. Sehe-perrh.—Ibid., 147. Serper.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1906.

Serranos (Span.: 'highlanders', 'mountaineers'). A Shoshonean division with a common dialect, centering in the San Bernardino mts., S. Cal., N. of Los Angeles, but extending down Mohave r. at least to Daggett and N. across the Mohave desert into the valley of Tejon cr. They also occupied San Bernardino valley. Fray Francisco Garcés, in 1775-76, described the Serranos near Tejon cr., under the name Cuabajai or Cuabajay (their Mohave name), as living in large square communal houses of tule mats on a framework of willow, each family having its own fireplace; they made small baskets, flint knives, and vessels inlaid with mother-of-pearl, and conducted much trade with the natives of the coast near Santa Barbara. One of their rancherias Garcés named San Pascual. The Serranos on the upper waters of Santa Ana r. he called also by their Mohave name, Jenequich (Hanakwiche). In his time these were approachable "and of middling good heart; they are of medium stature, and the women somewhat smaller, round-faced, flat-nosed, and rather ugly; their custom in gentiledom is for the men to go entirely naked, and the women wear some sort of deerskin, with which they cover themselves, and also some small coat of otter or of hare." The same friar visited the Serranos of Mohave r., whom he designated Beñemó (from l'an-yume, the Mohave name of this branch). These were very poor, but possessed baskets, otter and rabbit coats, and some very curious snares which they made of wild hemp. They subsisted on wild game and acorns. "As a rule they are very effeminate, and the women uncleanly, but all are very quiet and inoffensive." The Serranos formed part of the Indians brought under San Gabriel and San Fernando missions. So far as recorded the villages or rancherias of the Serranos were: Homhoabit, Jurumpa, Juyubit, Muscupiabit, San Benito, San Gorgonio, San Pascual, Tolocabi, and Yucaipa. In 1885 there were 396 Serranos attached to the Mission agency, but they are no longer separately enumerated.

Setangya (Set-āngyā, 'Sitting Bear'). A noted Kiowa chief and medicine-man, and leader of the principal war society of the tribe. Commonly known to the whites as Satank. He was born in the Blackhills region about the year 1810, his paternal grandmother having been a Sarsi woman. He became prominent at an early age, and is credited with having been a principal agent in negotiating the final peace between the Kiowa and the Cheyenne about 1840. His name heads the list of signers of the noted Medicine Lodge treaty of 1867. In 1870 his son was killed by the whites while raiding in Texas. The father went down into Texas, gathered the bones into a bundle, and brought them back, thenceforth carrying them about with him upon a special horse until himself killed about a year later. On May 17, 1871, in company with Settainte (q. v.) he led an attack on a wagon train in Texas, by which 7 white men lost their lives. On making public boast of the deed to the agent at Ft Sill, in the present Oklahoma, shortly afterward, he and two others were arrested by military authority to be sent to Texas for trial. Setangya, however, refused to be a prisoner, and deliberately inviting death, sang his own death song, wrenched the fetters from his wrists, and drawing a concealed knife sprang upon the guard and was shot to death by the troops surrounding him. He was buried in the military cemetery at Ft Sill. (J. M.)

Setasura. An ancient Jova pueblo at or near the site of the former settlement of Servas, in E. Sonora, Mexico. It was abandoned prior to 1678, probably on account of Apache depredations.

Sevilleta (Span.: 'Little Seville,' so called on account of its resemblance in situation to the Spanish city). A former pueblo of the Piro on the e. bank of the Rio Grande, about 20 m. above Socorro, N. Mex.; visited by Oñate in 1598 and named by him Nueva Sevilla. It was subsequently depopulated and destroyed by other tribes, probably Apache, with whom the inhabitants were at war, but it was resettled between 1626 and 1630, when it became the seat of the Franciscan mission of San Luis Obispo, having a number of other Piro pueblos as visitas. At this time it was mentioned as the most northerly of the Piro villages. In 1693 Vetancurt reported it to contain only 3 families, the remainder having fled with the Spaniards to El Paso at the outbreak of the Pueblo revolt in 1680. On the return of Gov. Otermin in 1681 he found the pueblo abandoned and almost in ruins; it was never resettled by Indians. Not to be confounded with Cebolleta in any of its various forms. Consult Bandler in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 239, 1892. See also Piros, Pueblos. (F. W. H.)

Sewaathlehutun (Se'-wa-açl-tçl'-tûn). A Takelma band or village on the s. side of Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, x, 235, 1890.

Sewackenaem. An Esopus chief at the council of 1658; called Semeckamenee and Sewackemamo at the peace treaty of 1660, and Seweckenamo in 1664 and 1667. Sewackenamie as sachem renewed a deed in 1674, and signed a renewal in 1681. He also acknowledged his mark in 1669, and was one of the 5 Esopus sachems at the treaty of that year. Sewakonama also signed an agreement with Gov. Nicolls in 1665. See N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XIII, 93, 150, 400, 533, 1851. (W. M. B.)

Sewan. A name among the Dutch settlers of New Netherland (whose traders obtained it from Rhode Island) for the Indian shell money called by the English settlers of Massachusetts wampum and peag (q. v.). The name sewan is first mentioned in a letter written by De Rasières in 1627. Spelled zeauvant by Montanus (1671), and seawan and seawant by other writers. The word is from Narraganset siuân, 'scattered,' from siueu, 'he scatters.' The shell money that bore this name among the Indians was unstrung and passed from hand to hand, by count, in a loose state, one dark purple bead being worth two white ones. The Dutch applied the name indiscriminately to the beads in a loose or scattered and strung state. See Roanoke. (W. R. G.)

Sewapoo. A tribe or band that lived about Delaware bay; probably a Delaware band in s. New Jersey.—De Laet (1633) in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., 1, 315, 1841.

Sewathen. A Cowichan tribe formerly living on the coast of British Columbia s. of the mouth of Fraser r. They are now on a reservation near Pt Roberts, called Chewassan from the name of the tribe. Pop. 50 in 1909.

Isowasson.—Can. Ind. Aff., 74, 1878. Sewā'çen.—Hill-Tout in Ethnol. Surv. Can., 54, 1902. Stauāçen.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887. Stcuwā'çel.—Boas in Rep. 64th Meeting B. A. A. Seweckenamo. See Sewackenuem.

Sewee. A small tribe, supposedly Siouan, formerly living in e. South Carolina. According to Rivers (Hist. So. Car., 36, 1856) they occupied the lower part of Santee r. and the coast westward to the divide of Ashley r., about the present Monks Corner, Berkeley co., where they adjoined the Etiwaw. Nothing is known of the language, but judging by their alliances and their final incorporation with the Catawba they are assumed to have been Siouan. Lawson, who met them in 1701, when they were living at the mouth of Santee r., states that they had been a Morris, Ill., Oct. 23, 1903. Shabonee's name is appended to the treaties of Prairie du Chien, Wis., Aug. 19, 1825, and July 29, 1829; Camp Tippecanoe, Ind., Oct. 20, 1832; and Chicago, Sept. 26, 1833. He was married three times, the last two wives living with him at the same time. He was succeeded as chief by his grandson, Smoke. See Matson, Memories of Shaubena, 1880.

Shabwasing. A Chippewa band in 1851, probably in lower Michigan.—Smith in Ind. Aff. Rep., 53, 1851.

Shackaconia. A tribe of the Mannahoac confederacy, formerly living on the s. bank of the Rappahannock, in Spotsylvania co., Va. Their principal village bore the same name.

Shackaconias.—Strachey (1612), Va., 104, 1849. Shackakonies.—Jefferson, Notes, 129, 1802. Shakabones.—Simons in Smith (1629), Va., i, 186, 1819.

Shackamaxon (of doubtful meaning). A Delaware village on the site of Kensington, now a part of Philadelphia, Pa. At this place Penn made his treaty with the Indians in 1682.

Shachamesink.—Heckewelder Narr., Connelley ed., 554, 1907 (given as Delaware form. German spelling). Shackamaxon.—Proud, Penn., i, 143, 1797. Shackaxons.—Boudinot, Star in the West, 128, 1816. Shakamaxon.—Proud, op. cit. Shakamaxunk.—Deed of 1676 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., xii, 550, 1877 (identical). Shakhamuxunk.—Doc. of 1679, ibid., 620. Shorbanaxon.—Rupp, West. Penn., 27, 1846 (misprint).

Shadjwane (Shadjwané). The Rabbit clan of the Yuchi (q. v.).—Speck, Yuchi Inds., 70, 1909.

Shaganappi. Thongs of rawhide used for rope or cord. Shaganappi, or "North-west iron," was an important factor in the economic development of the N. W., where it was a godsend to the mixed-bloods and white settlers. Out of it was made the harness of the famous Red river carts and of the dog sleds of the country to the northward. It was one of the most important gifts from the Indian to the white man. A variety of spellings of this word exists, as shaganappi, shaggineppi, and shaggunappy. It is derived from pisaganibuy, pishaganápi, in the Cree dialects of Algonquian, the corresponding Chippewa word being bishaganth, signifying 'a thong of rawhide.' Gerard gives the Wood Cree word as pishaganábi, from pishagan 'hide' (lit. 'what is flayed'), ábii 'cord', 'string', 'rope.' It has been said that "shaganappi and Scotchmen made the Northwest." A corresponding term is babiche (q. v.), though it is not of such importance as the other. (A. F. C.)

Shagoyewatha. See Red Jacket.

Shagsowanoghroona (Iroquois name). A tribe or band, probably Algonquian, living in Canada in 1759.—Canajoharie conf. (1759) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., vii, 393, 1856.

Shahaka (She'-he-ke, 'Coyote'). A Mandan chief, more commonly known as Le Gros Blanc, or Big White; born about 1765. He was principal chief of Metutahanke, the "Lower Village" of the Mandan, on the Missouri below the mouth of Knife r., and rendered friendly service to Lewis and Clark while at Ft. Mandan in the winter of 1804-5, in recognition of which he was given a medal. Brackenridge described him as a fat man, of mild and gentle disposition, not much distinguished as a warrior, "and extremely talkative, a fault much despised amongst the Indians"; and, again, as "a fine looking Indian, and very intelligent—his complexion fair, very little different from that of a white man much exposed to the sun." When the expedition returned to the Missouri from the Pacific, Lewis and Clark persuaded Shahaka to accompany them to St. Louis with a view of making a visit to President Jefferson, and Jefferson later invited Lewis to visit Monticello with Shahaka for the purpose of showing the latter his collection of Indian objects from the N. W. Shahaka remained in the E. for a year, and while there, evidently in Philadelphia, St. Mémin made a portrait of him with the aid of a physiognotrace, the original of which (see illustration) now belongs to the American Philosophical Society of Philadelphia. Shahaka left St. Louis for his home in May 1807, the party consisting of himself and his squaw-man interpreter, René Jessamine, with their wives and one child each, escorted by 2 noncommissioned officers and 11 privates under the command of Ensign Nathaniel Pryor, who, as a sergeant, had accompanied the expedition of Lewis and Clark. There ascended the Missouri at the same time a deputation of 24 Sioux, including 6 children, who were provided with a separate escort; and also 2 trading parties, one of which, consisting of 32 men under Pierre Chouteau, was designed to traffic with the Mandan. The expedition proceeded slowly up the Missouri, reaching the lower Arikara village on Sept. 9, where it was learned that the Mandan and the Arikara were at war. The demand of the chief of the upper Arikara village that Shahaka go ashore with him being refused, the Indians became insolent and aggressive, and afterward opened fire on the boats, which was returned. Pryor then ordered a retreat downstream, but the Indians followed along shore, killing one of the Sioux, mortally wounding one of Chouteau's men, and wounding several others, including Jessaume. Pryor now proposed to Shahaka that they attempt to cover the rest of the distance—about 3 days' journey—by land, but this the Mandan refused to do on account of the incumbrance of the women and children and the wounded condition of their interpreter, whereupon the party returned to St. Louis. By an agreement entered into with the Missouri Fur Co. in the spring of 1808 for the safe conduct of the Indians to their home, another expedition, consisting of about 150 men having Shahaka and his companions in charge, started from St. Louis about the middle of May 1809, and although the Sioux at first showed a disposition to be troublesome the Arikara were found to be friendly and the party reached its destination Sept. 24, laden with presents. Shahaka fell into disrepute among his people by reason of what were regarded as extravagant tales of his experiences among the whites. He was killed in a fight with the Sioux on an occasion when he went out to watch his people drive them off. Shahaka's wife was Yellow Corn; his son was White Painted House, whose son was Tobacco, whose son (Shahaka's great grandson) is Gun that Guards the House, who is still living and who preserves, with Shahaka's medal bearing date 1797, the story of his great grandfather's exploits. Shahala (Saxala, 'above'). A name given by Lewis and Clark to the Chinook-an tribes living on Columbia r. from Sauvies id. to the Cascades in Oregon. They estimated the number at 2,800, in 62 houses, and mention the following tribes: Neerchokioon, Clahclellah, Wahclellah, and Yehuh. Katlagakya was the native name for the Indians of this region. See Watlala. (L. F.)

Shahaptian Family (from Sáptini, pl. Saháptini, the Salish name for the Nez Percés). An important linguistic family occupying what is now s. w. Idaho, s. e. Washington, and n. e. Oregon. The earlier territory of the Shahaptian tribes extended from the Rocky mts. to the Cascade range, and from the Yakima r. basin to the Blue mts. of Oregon. This territory was overstepped at various times, particularly by the Klikitat in the w., who crossed the Cascades and occupied the headwaters of Cowlitz, Lewis, and White Salmon rs., and even pushed temporarily as far s. as Willamette valley after the depopulation of that region by fever in 1829 (see Chinookan). Along Columbia r. Shahaptian villages extended nearly to The Dalles, where they were checked by the Chinook, who had pushed to that point from the coast. To the e. occasional hunting parties crossed the Rockies, but no permanent settlements were formed. (Consult the linguistic map in Part I.)

The Shahaptian family is well defined linguistically, except possibly in its southern habitat where it may prove to be connected with the Wailatpuan and Shastan families, and possibly the Lutuamian. In customs and habits its tribes were fairly homogeneous. Family organization was loose and showed no traces of a clan system. Village communities of varying size were the rule, but were prevented from normal development by the seasonal changes of residence necessitated by the character of the food supply. Chiefs were local in authority except in times of emergency. Salmon was the staple article of food, but at the time of the Lewis and Clark expedition in 1804-05 hunting various kinds of game was common, and this had probably been much advanced by the introduction of horses. Roots and berries also were much used as food, but no agriculture was evident. The Shahaptian tribes have always had a high reputation for bravery and, except for certain sporadic outbreaks, have been friendly with the whites.

The following principal divisions of the stock are usually considered as separate tribes: Klikitat, Nez Percés, Palooos, Tenino, Tyigh, Umatilla, Wallawalla, and Yakima. A large number of smaller divisions are often spoken of as independent tribes, but which are really subordinate bands of one or another of the tribes named. Of these smaller bands those most frequently met with in literature are: Akaitchis, Atanumlema, Chimnapum, DesChutes, Klinquit, Kowasayee, John Day, Liaywas, Ochechote, Pisko, Pishquitpah, Shyik, Skinpah, Sokulk, Tilkuni, Tushepaw, Wahowpun, and Wiam. Shahwundais ('God of the South,' who makes the summer.—J. Jones). A converted Chippewa, generally known as John Sunday, who took an active part in the Methodist missionary work among his people during the early and middle parts of the 19th century. Peter Jones (Hist. Ojeb. Inds., 200, 1861) says he belonged to the Mink "tribe" (probably the Marten gens of Warren). His home, and probably the place of his birth, about 1796, was Alnwick district, Northumberland co., Ont. In 1823 John and Peter Jones, the latter the author of the History of the Ojebway Indians, were converted at the Methodist mission on Credit r., near Rice lake, Northumberland co. The brothers commenced teaching their people, and with other missionaries in 1826-27 held a camp-meeting near Coburg, at which Sunday was converted. He began at once to learn to read and write, was ordained as a minister, and entered actively into missionary work among the Chippewa. With George Copway and other native preachers he went on several missionary tours to the Chippewa about L. Superior. They established a permanent mission in 1833 at L'Anse on Keweenaw bay, Mich., and another in 1835 at Ottawa Lake, in the same state. Sunday appears to have devoted some time to special work among the Saulteurs at Sault Ste Marie, where his preaching was so highly regarded that women bearing children in their arms forded streams to reach the meeting place (Jones, op. cit., 227). It was about this period that the Rev. Wm. Case, who had been influential in bringing Sunday into the church, took him on a tour of the States for the purpose of raising funds for the Canadian missions. At the general council of the Christian Chippewa and Ottawa, held at Saugeen, Ont., in 1845, Sunday was present, and his eloquence on this occasion has received special mention. Copway (Life, Hist. and Trav., 197, 1847) says he was "uncommonly eloquent"; Jones (op. cit., 201) says he was "particularly happy in his address at this meeting, and towards the close, thrilled and astonished all present by the ingenuity and power of his appeals." After this he is not mentioned, though he was probably living as late as 1855. Copway speaks of him as a chief, and he signs as chief the report made by him and one Simpson as commissioners of Alnwick in 1842. (C. T.)

Shakaik (Shá'kák, 'many rattlesnakes'). A Pima village on the n. side of the Gila, n. w. of Casa Blanca, s. Ariz.—Russell in 26th Rep. B. A. E., 23, 1908.

Shakallamy. See Shikellamy.

Shakan (Cará'n). A summer village of the Henya on the n.w. coast of Prince of Wales id., Alaska, whither they used to go for fish eggs.

Shakchukla (Shak-chuk'-la, 'crayfish people'). A Choctaw clan of the Watakihulata phratry.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 162, 1878.

Shakehand. Principal chief of the Yankton Sioux in 1804. He was the leader in the council with Lewis and Clark, held opposite the present city of Yankton, S. Dak., when the explorers were going up the Missouri r. He had previously visited Mackinaw and St Louis. (D. R.)

Shakes' Village. A summer camp of the head Stikine chief Cēks, on Etolin id., Alaska; pop. 38 in 1880.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 32, 1884.

Shakian ('beaver'). A Yuchi clan. Cagā'.—Speck, Yuchi Inds., 70, 1909 (c-sh). Shakia tahá.—Gatschet, Uchee MS., B. A. E., 71, 1885 (= 'beaver clan').

Shakkeen. A (former?) Salish village or band under Fraser superintendency, Brit. Col.—Brit. Col. map, Ind. Aff., Victoria, 1872.

Shakopee (Shakpe, 'six'). The name of a succession of chiefs of the Mdewakanton Sioux, residing on Minnesota r. not far from the present town of Shakopee, Scott co., Minn. Three men of the name are mentioned in succession. The first met Maj. S. H. Long at the mouth of the Minnesota in 1817, when he came up to distribute the presents which Lieut. Z. M. Pike had contracted to send them 12 years earlier, and Long found him very offensive. This Shakopee was succeeded by his son, who was known as Eaglehead Shakopee, and he by his son Little Six (Shakopeela), who was a leader in the Minnesota massacre of 1862. See Tuoapa. (D. R.)

Shakori. A small tribe associated with the Eno and Adshusheer in North Carolina in the 17th century. It is doubtful, from their physical characteristics, whether they were of Siouan stock, though they were allied with Siouan tribes. As the Shakori were constantly associated with the Eno they were probably linguistically related to them. They are first mentioned by Yardley (1654), who says a Tuscarora Indian described to him among other tribes of the interior "a great nation called Cacoress," of dwarfish stature, not exceeding that of boys of 14 years, yet exceedingly brave and fierce in fight and active in retreat, so that even the powerful Tuscarora were unable to conquer them. They were then near neighbors of the Eno. Lederer (1672) found the villages of the two tribes about 14 m. apart, that of the Shakori being farthest w. In 1701 Lawson found the two tribes confederated, and the Adshusheer with them. Their village, which he calls Adshusheer, was on Eno r. about 14 m. E. of the Occaneechi village, probably a short distance N. E. of the present Durham, N. C.

They resembled the Eno in their customs. According to Col. Barnwell, commander in the Tuscarora war of 1711, they are identical with the Sissipahaw. Consult Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1894.

Shallon. A name for the fruit of Gaultheria shallon, mentioned first in Allen's History of Lewis and Clark's Expedition, 1814. The name, also spelled shal-lun, is a corruption of Chinook kl'kuru-shalla. (W. R. G.)

Shallyany's Village. A summer camp of a Stikine chief named Cātyā'ni, on Stikine r., Alaska; pop. 24 in 1880.—Petroff, 10th Census, Alaska, 32, 1882.

Shamans and Priests. Mediators between the world of spirits and the world of men may be divided into two classes: The shamans, whose authority was entirely dependent on their individual ability, and the priests, who acted in some measure for the tribe or nation, or at least for some society.

Shaman is explained variously as a Persian word meaning 'pagan', or, with more likelihood, as the Tungus equivalent for 'medicine-man', and was originally applied to the medicine-men or exorcists in Siberian tribes, from which it was extended to similar individuals among the Indian tribes of America.

Among the Haida and Tlingit, shamans performed practically all religious functions, including, as usual, that of physician, and occasionally a shaman united the civil with the religious power by being a town or house chief also. Generally speaking, he obtained his position from an uncle, inheriting his spiritual helpers just as he might his material wealth; but there were also shamans who became such owing to natural fitness. In either case the first intimation of his new power was given by the man falling senseless and remaining in that condition for a certain period. Elsewhere in North America, however, the sweat bath was an important assistant in bringing about the proper psychic state, and certain individuals became shamans after escaping from a stroke of lightning or the jaws of a wild beast. When treating a patient or otherwise performing, a N. W. coast shaman was supposed to be possessed by a supernatural being whose name he bore and whose dress he imitated, and among the Tlingit this spirit was often supported by several minor spirits which were represented upon the shaman's mask and strengthened his eyesight, sense of smell, etc. He let his hair grow long, never cutting or dressing it. When performing he ran around the fire very rapidly in the direction of the sun, while his assistant beat upon a wooden drum and his friends sang the spirit songs and beat upon narrow pieces of board. Then the spirit showed him what he was trying to discover, the location of a whale or other food animal, the approach of an enemy, or the cause of the sickness of a patient. In the latter case he removed the object that was causing pain by blowing upon the affected part, sucking at it, or rubbing a charm upon it. If the soul had wandered, he captured and restored it, and in case the patient had been bewitched he revealed the name of the offender and directed how he was to be handled. Payment for his services must always be made in advance, but in case of failure it was usually returned, while among some tribes failure was punished with death. Shamans also performed sleight-of-hand feats to show their power, and two shamans among hostile people would fight each other through the air by means of their spirits, while no war party started off without one.

The ideas behind shamanistic practices in other American tribes were very much the same as these, but the forms which they took varied considerably. Thus instead of being actually possessed, Iroquois shamans and probably others controlled their spirits objectively as if they were handling so many instruments, while Chitimacha shamans consulted their helpers in trances.

Among the Nootka there were two classes of shamans, the Uctāk-u, or 'workers', who cured a person when sickness was thrown upon him by an enemy or when it entered in the shape of an insect, and the K'ok'ōā'tsmaah, or 'soul workers', especially employed to restore a wandering soul to its body.

The Songish of the southern end of Vancouver id. also had two sorts of shamans. Of these the higher, called the squnā'am, acquired his power in the usual way by intercourse with supernatural beings, while the sī'oua, who was usually a woman, received her knowledge from another sī'oua. The former answered more nearly to the common type of shaman, while the function of the latter was to appease hostile powers, to whom she spoke a sacred language. She was also applied to by women who desired to bear children, and for all kinds of charms.

Among the interior Salish the initiation of shamans and warriors seems to have taken place in one and the same manner, i. e. through animals which became the novices' guardian spirits. Kutenai shamans had special lodges in the camp larger than the rest, in which they prayed and invoked the spirits.

The Hupa of California recognized two sorts of shamans: the dancing shamans, who determined the cause of disease and the steps necessary for recovery, and other shamans, who after locating the trouble removed it by sucking. Mohave shamans usually receive their powers directly from Mastamho, the chief deity, and acquire them by dreaming rather than the more usual methods of fasting, isolation, petition, etc. Dixon records this latter feature also among the Shasta. The Maidu seem to have presented considerable variations within one small area. In some sections heredity played little part in determining who should become a shaman, but in the N. E. part of the Maidu country all of a shaman's children were obliged to take up his profession or the spirits would kill them. There were two sorts of shamans—the shaman proper, whose functions were mainly curative, and the “dreamer,” who communicated with spirits and the ghosts of the dead. All shamans were also dreamers, but not the reverse. During the winter months the dreamers held meetings in darkened houses, where they spoke with the spirits much like modern spirit mediums. At other times the shamans of the foothill region met to see which was most powerful, and danced until all but one had dropped out. One who had not had a shaman for a parent had to go into the mountains to a place where some spirit was supposed to reside, fast, and go through certain ceremonies, and when a shaman desired to obtain more powerful helpers than those he possessed he did the same. Shamans in this region always carried cocoon rattles.

Hoffman enumerates three classes of shamans among the Chippewa, in addition to the herbalist or doctor, properly so considered. These were the wābēnō', who practised medical magic, the jēs'-sakkī'd, who were seers and prophets deriving their power from the thunder god, and the midē', who were concerned with the sacred society of the Midē'wiwin, and should rather be regarded as priests.

These latter were evidently represented among the Delawares by the medeu, who concerned themselves especially with healing, while there was a separate class of diviners called pourrow, or ‘dreamers.’

Unlike most shamans, the angakunirn of the Central Eskimo communicated with their spirits while seated. It was their chief duty to find out the breaking of what taboos had caused sickness or storms.

As distinguished from the calling of a shaman, that of a priest was, as has been said, national or tribal rather than individual, and if there were considerable ritual his function might be more that of leader in the ceremonies and keeper of the sacred myths than direct mediator between spirits and men. Sometimes, as on the N. W. coast and among the Eskimo, the functions of priest and shaman might be combined, and the two terms have been used so interchangeably by writers, especially when applied to the Eastern tribes, that it is often difficult to tell which is the proper one.

Even where shamanism flourished most there was a tendency for certain priestly functions to center around the town or tribal chief. This appears among the Haida, Tlingit, Tsimshian, and Kwakiutl in the prominent part the chiefs played in secret society performances, and a chief of the Fraser r. coast Salish was even more of a high priest than a civil chief, leading his people in all religious functions.

Most of the tribes of the eastern plains contained two classes of men that may be placed in this category. One of these classes consisted of societies which concerned themselves with healing and applied definite remedies, though at the same time invoking superior powers, and to be admitted to which a man was obliged to pass through a period of instruction. The other was made up of the one or the few men who acted as superior officers in the conduct of national rituals, and who transmitted their knowledge concerning it to an equally limited number of successors. Similar to these, perhaps, were the priests of the Midē'wiwin ceremony among the Chippewa, Menominee, and other Algonquian tribes.

According to Bartram, “besides several juniors or graduates” there was a high priest in every Creek town. These were persons of consequence and exercised great influence in the state, particularly in military affairs. They would “foretell rain or drought and pretend to bring rain at pleasure, cure diseases, and exorcise witchcraft, invoke or expel evil spirits, and even assume the power of directing thunder and lightning.” The Natchez state was a theocracy in which the head chief, or “Great Sun,” being directly descended from the national law-giver who had come out of the sun, was ex-officio high priest of the nation, although the guardian of the temple seems to have relieved him partially of his priestly duties. The rest of the Suns shared in their functions to a minor degree, they forming a sacred caste.

Doubtless the most highly developed priesthood N. of Mexico, however, is among the Pueblos of New Mexico and Arizona, where it controls the civil and military branches of the tribe, transforming it into a theocratic oligarchy. The rain priesthood is a body almost entirely composed of men whose duty it is by secret prayers and fasts to bring plentiful supplies of rain. The priesthood of the bow is really a war society whose ceremonies are held to give thanks for abundant crops, or, after a scalp had been taken, to bring about rain through the pleasure that the taking of this scalp gives to the anthropic gods, the controllers of the rain. The two head priests of the bow and the rain priests of the six cardinal points form the fountain head of all authority and the court of last appeal in Zúñi. Each of these, except the priest of the zenith, has several assistants, and the priestess of fecundity, the female assistant of the priest of the north, who stands highest in rank, possesses very great authority. Below these are the society of Kótikilli and the esoteric societies. All male Zúñi and very rarely some females are admitted into the former, which deals directly with the anthropic gods and whose ceremonials are for the purpose of bringing rain. The esoteric societies, however, have to do mainly with the zoic or beast gods and are primarily healing societies. A patient may be treated by them at the time of the ceremonies or he may send for a single member. These societies also hold very important ceremonies to bring rain, but they effect this mediately through the influence which the beast gods are supposed to exert upon the anthropic gods. The active members of these societies, including the Kótikilli also, in contradistinction to the rain and war priests, are called by a special name "theurgists," but their functions approach nearer to those of priests than of shamans (Stevenson).

Shamapa. A tribe, band, or village of the ancient Powhatan confederacy, on Pamunkey or York r., Va., numbering about 500 early in the 17th century.—Strachey (1612), Va., 62, 1849.

Shamokin (probably from Lenape Shámókenk, 'where horns, or antlers, are plenty.'—Gerard). The largest and most important Indian settlement in Pennsylvania after the dispersion of the Delawares and during the first half of the 18th century. The old Indian village was situated a short distance from the forks of the Susquehanna, on the N. E. branch. Later the settlement was on both sides of the river, including the island, at the site of Sunbury, Northumberland co. Before the historic period the location had evidently been a stopping place for the Iroquois on returning from their raids into the country of the Cherokee and Catawba. Here they met, as they did in later days, to hold their last celebration before their return to their villages in New York. It was the most strategic location in the province for an Indian settlement, since from this point all the region of the Potomac, the Delaware, and the Ohio could be easily reached; to gain the Ohio country but a short portage was necessary from Canoe Place to Kittanning. The forks of the Susquehanna thus became the point of convergence of the various trails leading to the Potomac, Wyoming, and the Ohio. The population was made up of Delawares, Shawnee, and Iroquois. The Shawnee came into the province from the S. in 1698, and soon began to settle along the Susquehanna and its branches. By 1727, when they first commenced to go westward to the Ohio, a large number of them was settled at Shamokin. In the following year the Onondaga council appointed Shikellamy (q. v.) to act as the deputy of the Iroquois at Shamokin, with instructions to have special oversight of the Shawnee (Archives Pa., i, 228, 1852). From this time until 1755 Shamokin was regarded as the Indian capital of the province; it was not only headquarters of the Iroquois influence, but also was the residence of Allummapees, the "king" of the Delawares. At the council in Philadelphia in the summer of 1742 the various disputes concerning land sales on the Susquehanna were brought up by the Delawares. In a stinging reply to the Delaware complaints, Canassatego, the Iroquois chief, ordered the Delawares to remove from their lands to Shamokin or Wyoming and to have nothing whatever to do with the sales of lands in the future (Col. Rec. Pa., iv., 579-80, 1851). They never forgot this reproach, and went to Shamokin and Wyoming to consider their wrongs and to listen to the Shawnee warriors who were seeking to have them remove to the Ohio. Count Zinzendorf, under the guidance of Conrad Weiser, visited Shamokin in the fall of 1742, where he met Shikellamy, with whom he held several conferences. A friendship sprang up between the Iroquois deputy and the Moravian Brethren which lasted during the life of the wise chief, who was one of the most conservative of the leaders of the Six Nations. Zinzendorf was very much interested in the Iroquois vicegerent, and wrote much about this visit to Shamokin in his journal (Mem. Moravian Church, 84 et seq., 1870). Various missionaries of the Moravian Church labored at Shamokin from this time until its abandonment in 1755, among them being Mack, Post, Pyrlæus, and Zeisberger. During these days the Indian settlement had a bad reputation. Martin Mack, who with his wife was obliged to flee to the woods nearly every night from the drunken savages, said that it "was the very seat of the Prince of Darkness." David Brainerd, who visited the village each year, said in 1745: "The town lies partly on the east and west shores of the river and partly on the island. It contains upwards of 50 houses and 300 inhabitants. The Indians of the place are accounted the most drunken, mischievous, and ruffian-like fellows of any in these parts—about one-half are Delawares and the others are Senecas and Tutelars" (Mem. Moravian Church, 67, 1870). At the council at Philadelphia in 1744 the Delawares stated that the Shawnee had removed to the Ohio, chiefly through the influence of Peter Chartier (Col. Rec. Pa., iv, 757, 1851). In the year before a number of the Conoy Indians had removed to Shamokin (ibid., 657). In 1747 the Moravians built a smithy in the village at the request of Shikellamy. The Delaware "king," Allummapees, died in 1747, and Shikellamy, the Iroquois deputy, died in the year following. In 1749 all the Indians were obliged to leave Shamokin for want of provisions (Arch. Pa., ii, 23, 1852). Taghneghdoarus, Shikellamy's eldest son, at the request of Weiser, became the deputy of the Iroquois in the province (see Weiser's Journals of his three visits to Shamokin in 1743, 1744, in Col. Rec. Pa., iv, 640, 646, 680, 1851). At the treaty of Albany (1754) the Iroquois reserved the lands at Shamokin and Wyoming as their hunting grounds (ibid., vi, 119, 1851). John Shikellamy, the eldest son of the old Oneida vicegerent, was appointed to look after these lands and all Iroquois affairs in the province. Gov. Morris, in a letter to Gen. Shirley, tells of the Indian raid near Shamokin and gives a description of the location as suitable for a fort (ibid., 665). In 1755, after Braddock's defeat, the entire region was at the mercy of the hostile Delawares and Shawnee. The former, who were faithful to the English, were obliged to leave Shamokin. Scarouady, at the council in Philadelphia in the fall of 1755, spoke very plainly concerning the situation, and said that if the English "will not fight with us we will go somewhere else" (ibid., 686). In the winter of 1755 Gov. Morris spoke of his intention of building a fort at Shamokin to protect the frontier (ibid., 701). At the council at Carlisle (1756), The Belt, a Delaware chief, asked that a fort be built at Shamokin for the protection of the friendly Indians and as a place of refuge for their wives and children when they were away (ibid., vii, 6, 1851). This request was repeated at the council at Philadelphia in the spring (ibid., 54). At a council held in April (1756) Scarouady spoke of the importance of the English having a fort at this place to which the friendly Indians could go (ibid., 80). He later informed the governor that he and all the women and children were going to Onondaga, and that they would return when a fort was built at Shamokin (ibid., 90). In May, Gov. Morris was at Harris Ferry, on his way to Shamokin, where a fort was to be built. During the spring and summer of 1756 the fort was built on the E. bank of the Susquehanna, just below the junction of the North and West branches, at the upper end of the present Sunbury. The French realizing the necessity of holding this point, sent an expedition in the fall of 1756 to build a fort at the place. They reached the mouth of Loyal Sock cr., and finding the force at work building Ft Augusta, retreated. Col. Clapham, who had charge of the building of the fort, was succeeded by Col. James Burd (see Archives Pa., 2d s., ii, 745-820, 1890). In June, 1756, just previous to the coming of the English force to build the fort, all the houses in the place were burned by hostile Indians (Col. Rec. Pa., vii, 154, 1851). Various Indian agents were appointed to reside at Ft Augusta during this period (ibid., viii, 99, 128, 501, 1852). A number of important conferences were held with the Indians at Ft Augusta by Col. Francis in 1769 (ibid., ix, 610-620, 1852). After the conclusion of the French and Indian war the clamor of the "peace at any price" element in the province led to the dismantling of the fort. The conditions along the frontiers were deplorable; nearly the entire region on the West branch was entirely deserted. After the commencement of the Revolution the fort became the military headquarters for the upper Susquehanna, and during the entire period the authorities at the fort were kept busy. The massacre of Wyoming and the Big Runaway filled Ft Augusta with people who had left their homes to escape the fury of the Indians.

Shannopin's Town. A former Delaware village on Allegheny r., about 2 m. above the junction with the Monongahela, within the limits of the present city of Pittsburg, Pa., between Penn ave. and the river, and N. of Thirtieth st. The locality was occupied by about 20 families of Delawares in 1730, and was named for the chief, Shanopin, who lived there at that time. On account of its situation on the trail between the Susquehanna, Ohio, Beaver, and Muskingum rs., it was much frequented by Indian traders. In April 1730 Gov. Gordon of Pennsylvania received a letter from the chiefs of the Delawares at "Allee-gaeening on the Main road," written by Edmund Cartledge, James Le Tort, and Joseph Davenport (three prominent traders), telling of the death of a trader named John Hartt, and requesting that something be done to put a stop to the unrestricted sale of rum and the coming of so many traders into "the woods." This letter was signed by mark by "Shaw-annoppan" and others (Arch. Pa., I, 255, 1852). The same traders also wrote to the Governor informing him of the abuse of the Indian trade caused by the sale of rum, the Indians buying it with their peltries and being unable to pay their debts to the traders who made the complaint. These Delawares then owed the traders about £2,000 for goods which they had purchased (ibid., 261). Thus early began the trouble among the rival traders on the Ohio, chiefly through the sale of liquor. Conrad Weiser passed through the place on his way to Logstown in 1748, the Indians treating him with kindness (Col. Rec. Pa., v, 348, 1851), and Shanopin attended the conference at that place. The expedition of Celeron de Bienville in the following year also stopped at the place, which is noted on Bonnecamp's map as "Village du Loups." Christopher Gist, the agent of the Ohio Company, likewise stopped here in 1750 on his way to the Muskingum, and recorded in his journal: "The River Ohio is 76 Poles wide at Shannopin Town: There are about twenty Families in this town" (Darlington, Gist's Jour., 34, 1893). In Lewis Evans's Analysis of Map of the Middle Colonies (1775), he says (p. 25): "At Shannopins there is a fording place in very dry times and the lowest down the river." The fording place, which Gist crossed, was at this point, where the Indian trail crossed the Allegheny, then ran along near the location of East and West Ohio sts. to Beaver ave. and on to Logstown (see Gist's map). Washington and Gist were both at the village in the winter of 1753, when on their way to the French fort at Venango. They swam their horses across the Allegheny at this point, and spent the night on that side of the river, the next day going on to Logstown (Darlington, Gist's Jour., 81, 1893; Washington's Jour. of 1753 in Olden Time, I, 12-26, 1846; Sparks, Writings of Wash., II, 432-447, 1834). According to Ensign Ward's deposition the French under Contracœur were first noticed by him as they descended the river "at Shanopins Town about two Miles distant from the Fort the 17th. of April last" (Darlington, Gist's Jour., 275, 1893). George Croghan, when on his way to Logstown in 1754, was overtaken at this point by Andrew Montour and John Patten, who were on their way to the western Indians with the two Shawnee prisoners who had been released from jail in Charleston, S. C. (Col. Rec. Pa., v, 731, 1851), Croghan noting that "from Lowril Hill to Shanopens is butt 46 Miles" (Arch. Pa., II, 132, 1852). The place is mentioned also in the table of distances as given by John Patten (Col. Rec. Pa., v, 750, 1851). In the examination of Mr West before the Provincial Council, in 1754, he said: "Col. Joshua Fry . . . took an observation on the 16th of June 1752, at a Place about a Mile North of Shanoppin Town, and found the Sun's Meridian Altitude to be $72^{\circ} 54'$. . . Latitude $40^{\circ} 29'$ " (ibid., 751). Richard Peters, in his letter of information to the Governor concerning the distances to the Ohio, says "Who [the traders] all agree that it is 34 Miles from Laurel Hill to Shanoppin, and from Shanoppin to Weningo 34 Miles by what Mr. Patten and Mr. West have heard" (ibid., 759). According to the statement of Lewis Montour, this was the place of residence of the Half King (Tanacharison) and Scarouady in 1753 (Col. Rec. Pa., v, 702). General Forbes's army passed by the site in 1758, on its way to the ruins of Ft Duquesne. At that time many of the bodies of the Scotch Highlanders of Grant's ill-fated detachment were found along the river front, where they had been tortured to death.

The Delaware chief after whom the village was named is first noticed in the letter from James Le Tort, above noted. He was present at the council in Philadelphia in 1740, at which time he is spoken of as "Schahanapan" (Col. Rec. Pa., IV, 447, 1851). His name appears attached to several letters as "Shawanoppan" (Arch. Pa., I, 255, 1852). He wrote a letter to Gov. Gordon in 1732, thanking him for the present of a cask of rum (ibid., 341). He died between 1749 and 1751, as Gov. Hamilton, in a letter sent to the Indians at Logstown by Croghan and Montour in the latter year, says: "Shawanapon and Others are since dead" (Col. Rec. Pa., v, 519, 1851).

Shasta (from Süsti'ka, apparently the name of a well-known Indian of the tribe living about 1840 near the site of Yreka). A group of small tribes or divisions forming the Shastan linguistic family of N. California and formerly extending into Oregon. The area occupied by the Shasta is quite irregular, and consists of one main and three subsidiary areas. The main body, comprising the Iruwaitso, Kam-matwa, Katiru, and Kikataik, with whom there was little diversity in language, occupied Klamath r. from Klamath Hot Springs to Happy Camp, the n. half of Shasta valley, the whole of Scott valley, and the upper part of the s. part of Salmon r. During the last hundred years, at least, they inhabited also the valley of Stewart r. in Oregon from its source to the junction of Rogue r. The three subsidiary groups, consisting of the Konomihu, New River Indians, and Okwanuchu, occupied the forks of the Salmon, the head of New r., and McCloud and upper Sacramento rs. and Squaw cr. These subsidiary groups are now practically extinct. For the distribution of the component divisions see under their respective names. The culture and customs of the Shasta seem to have been much the same throughout this area, but linguistically they were divided into four groups speaking divergent dialects. Little record has been preserved of their characteristics, and with their decrease in numbers and proximity to civilization, they have lost practically all their native customs. They were a sedentary people, living in small villages, composed of rectangular, semisubterranean plank houses, similar to those in use by the Indians on the coast immediately to the w. Their food was largely vegetal, made up of acorns, seeds, and roots; but fish, particularly salmon, was an important factor in the food supply. The salmon were caught by net, weir, trap, and spear, and were dried and preserved for winter food. Their arts were few. Dugout canoes of rather broad, clumsy type, similar to those used nearer the mouth of the Klamath, were in use. The bow was the chief weapon. Carving was practically limited to rude spoons of wood and bone, painting was little used, and basketry was not developed to any great extent, being confined chiefly to basket caps for the women and small food baskets of simple form and ornament. There was no clan organization, and the village seems to have been the unit, as elsewhere in California. Their religious beliefs and ceremonials seem to have been only in small part similar to the tribes to the e. and w. of them, but their mythology is not as rich as that of the Maidu, Wintun, or other of the northern California linguistic groups. The first contact of the Shasta with the whites was with fur traders, who early in the 19th century trapped in their territory. With the opening of the trade route from Oregon to California by way of Sacramento valley in the middle of the 19th century, the Shasta came more into contact with civilization, and the development of gold mining in the 60's hastened the process of their extinction, for they soon succumbed to the unfavorable environment of the mining camp. There are fewer than a score now living, some on the Grande Ronde res. in Oregon, the others scattered about their former territory. The names Idakariuke, Ikaruck, and Kosetah have been mentioned, largely through misunderstanding, as those of Shasta divisions and villages. Consult Dixon, (1) in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, pt. 5, 1907; (2) in Am. Anthr., x, no. 2, 1908. (R. B. D.)

Shastan Family (adapted from Shasta, q. v., the name of one of its divisions). A linguistic stock comprising two principal groups, the Sastean and the Palaihnihan of Powell, which until recently (Dixon in Am. Anthr., VII, 213, 1905, and in Internat. Cong. Amer., 1906, Quebec, 1907) were regarded as distinct families. The area occupied by the Shasta division was the Klamath valley in n. California and s. Oregon, extending, in the northern part, up the valleys of Jenny and Cottonwood crs. and over the entire valley of Stewart r. to its mouth; from here they controlled the area along Rogue r., above the mouth of the Stewart, to Little Butte cr., as well as the basin of the latter stream, which heads near the base of Mt Pit. Another tribe, the Konomihu, determined by Dixon to be related to the Shasta group, occupied the region about the Forks of Salmon in California, extending for 7 m. up the s. fork and 5 m. up the n. fork, while above them, on the upper courses of the two forks and extending over the divide into the head of New r., resided the related New River tribe. Still another Shasta tribe, known as Okwanuchu, formerly occupied the head of Sacramento r. down as far as Salt cr. and the upper part of the McCloud as far down as Squaw cr., together with the valley of the latter stream.

The other division of the family, hitherto known as the Palaihnihan or Pit River Indians, consisting of the Achomawi, Astakiwi, Atsugewi, Atuami, Chumawi, Hantiwi, Humawhi, Ilmawi, and Pakamali, occupied chiefly the area drained by Pit r. in extreme n. California. For further information see under the tribal names.

One of the most ancient Chippewa villages, situated on Long id., formerly known as Chaquamegon peninsula, on the coast of L. Superior, in Ashland co., Wis. On account of the inroads of the Sioux, the village was at one time removed to the adjacent Madeleine id., about where La Pointe now is. For a long time it was the only village of the Chippewa excepting Pawating, but was finally abandoned for superstitious reasons. In 1665 the Jesuits established on Long id., among the Huron, Tionontati, and Ottawa then residing there, the mission of La Pointe du St Esprit. Numbers from the surrounding Algonquian tribes soon joined the mission, which flourished until broken up by the Sioux in 1670. At the beginning of the 19th century the village was on the mainland near the site of Bayfield, Wis. In later times it has commonly been known as La Pointe. (J. M.)

ently included a portion of the interior, s. of Nantucket harbor. See Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., III, 25, 1815.

Shavehead. A well known Potawatomi chief, so named by the whites because, like many of his ancestors, he kept the hair shaved from the greater part of his scalp. The dates of his birth and death are not known, but he lived during the early part of the 19th century in the s. e. part of Cass co., Mich. As a warrior Shavehead was the terror of the vicinity, feared by both whites and Indians. He participated in many battles and manifested a determined hatred for the whites, openly boasting of the scalps he had taken, and wearing them as trophies about his person. It was reported, although probably with great exaggeration, that he possessed a string of 99 white men's tongues. Many incidents of Shavehead's vindictiveness are related. After the mail stages had begun to run on the Chicago road, Shavehead, claiming the rights of his people as proprietors of the soil, established himself at a ferry of St Joseph r., near Mottville, and demanded tribute from every one who crossed, especially the settlers who were compelled to use this route to the nearest grist mill. Finally, exasperated beyond endurance, one of the settlers caught the Indian unaware and administered a severe beating, which had the effect of curing his depredations, but making him more sullen. He is described in his old age as being tall and erect, quite dark, and with not a hair on his head. Both a lake and a prairie bear his name.

Several stories are told of the manner of Shavehead's death, but they can not be substantiated. One is that the old chief, while boasting of his part in the massacre at Ft Dearborn, Chicago, in 1812, was recognized by a surviving soldier, who followed him out of the village, and, it is supposed, murdered him. Another account states that after significantly saying that there was no longer game enough for both the Indian and the white man, he was killed by a white hunter who had been his companion on many hunting expeditions. The last and more probable story is that he died, enfeebled by age and poverty, and was buried in a hollow log in the forest. Settlers visited his grave and severed his head from his body, and his skull was said in 1889 to be in the collection of the pioneers of Van Buren co. One of Shavehead's sons died in prison under a life sentence for murder. See Coll. Mich. Pion. and Hist. Soc., v, 1884; xiv, 1890; xxviii, 1900. (F. S. N.)

Shawnee (from shawün, 'south'; shawünogí, 'southerners.'—W. J.). Formerly a leading tribe of South Carolina, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. By reason of the indefinite character of their name, their wandering habits, their connection with other tribes, and because of their interior position away from the traveled routes of early days, the Shawnee were long a stumbling block in the way of investigators. Attempts have been made to identify them with the Massawomec of Smith, the Erie of the early Jesuits, and the Andaste of a somewhat later period, while it has also been claimed that they originally formed one tribe with the Sauk and Foxes. None of these theories, however, rests upon sound evidence, and all have been abandoned. Linguistically the Shawnee belongs to the group of Central Algonquian dialects, and is very closely related to Sauk-Fox. The name "Savanoos," applied by the early Dutch writers to the Indians living upon the s. bank of Delaware r., in New Jersey, did not refer to the Shawnee, and was evidently not a proper tribal designation, but merely the collective term, "southerners," for those tribes southward from Manhattan id., just as Wappanoos, "easterners," was the collective term for those living toward the e. Evelyn, who wrote about 1646, gives the names of the different small bands in the s. part of New Jersey, while Rittenber names those in the n., but neither mentions the Shawnee.

The tradition of the Delawares, as embodied in the Walam Olum, makes themselves, the Shawnee, and the Nanticoke, originally one people, the separation having taken place after the traditional expulsion of the Talligewi (Cherokee, q. v.) from the N., it being stated that the Shawnee went S. Beyond this it is useless to theorize on the origin of the Shawnee or to strive to assign them any earlier location than that in which they were first known and where their oldest traditions place them—the Cumberland basin in Tennessee, with an outlying colony on the middle Savannah in South Carolina. In this position, as their name may imply, they were the southern advance guard of the Algonquian stock. Their real history begins in 1669-70. They were then living in two bodies at a considerable distance apart, and these two divisions were not fully united until nearly a century later, when the tribe settled in Ohio. The attempt to reconcile conflicting statements without a knowledge of this fact has occasioned much of the confusion in regard to the Shawnee. The apparent anomaly of a tribe living in two divisions at such a distance from each other is explained when we remember that the intervening territory was occupied by the Cherokee, who were at that time the friends of the Shawnee. The evidence afforded by the mounds shows that the two tribes lived together for a considerable period, both in South Carolina and in Tennessee, and it is a matter of history that the Cherokee claimed the country vacated by the Shawnee in both states after the removal of the latter to the N. It is quite possible that the Cherokee invited the Shawnee to settle upon their eastern frontier in order to serve as a barrier against the attacks of the Catawba and other enemies in that direction. No such necessity existed for protection on their northwestern frontier. The earliest notices of the Carolina Shawnee represent them as a warlike tribe, the enemies of the Catawba and others, who were also the enemies of the Cherokee. In Ramey's Annals of Tennessee is the statement, made by a Cherokee chief in 1772, that 100 years previously the Shawnee, by permission of the Cherokee, removed from Savannah r. to the Cumberland, but were afterward driven out by the Cherokee, aided by the Chickasaw, in consequence of a quarrel with that they were joined here by that part of the tribe which had settled at Pequea, which was abandoned about 1730. When the Delawares and Munsee were forced to leave the Delaware r. in 1742 they also moved over to the Wyoming valley, then in possession of the Shawnee, and built a village on the e. bank of the river opposite that occupied by the latter tribe. In 1740 the Quakers began work among the Shawnee at Wyoming and were followed two years later by the Moravian Zinzendorf. As a result of this missionary labor the Shawnee on the Susquehanna remained neutral for some time during the French and Indian war, which began in 1754, while their brethren on the Ohio were active allies of the French. About the year 1755 or 1756, in consequence of a quarrel with the Delawares, said to have been caused by a childish dispute over a grasshopper, the Shawnee abandoned the Susquehanna and joined the rest of their tribe on the upper waters of the Ohio, where they soon became allies of the French. Some of the eastern Shawnee had already joined those on the Ohio, probably in small parties and at different times, for in the report of the Albany congress of 1754 it is found that some of that tribe had removed from Pennsylvania to the Ohio about 30 years previously, and in 1735 a Shawnee band known as Shaweygria (Hathawekela), consisting of about 40 families, described as living with the other Shawnee on Allegheny r., refused to return to the Susquehanna at the solicitation of the Delawares and Iroquois. The only clue in regard to the number of these eastern Shawnee is Drake's statement that in 1732 there were 700 Indian warriors in Pennsylvania, of whom half were Shawnee from the S. This would give them a total population of about 1,200, which is probably too high, unless those on the Ohio are included in the estimate.

Having shown the identity of the Savannah with the Shawnee, and followed their wanderings from Savannah r. to the Ohio during a period of about 80 years, it remains to trace the history of the other, and apparently more numerous, division upon the Cumberland, who preceded the Carolina band in the region of the upper Ohio r., and seem never to have crossed the Alleghanies to the eastward. These western Shawnee may possibly be the people mentioned in the Jesuit Relation of 1648, under the name of "Ouchaouanag," in connection with the Mascoutens, who lived in n. Illinois. In the Relation of 1670 we find the "Chaouanon" mentioned as having visited the Illinois the preceding year, and they are described as living some distance to the s. e. of the latter. From this period until their removal to the N. they are frequently mentioned by the French writers, sometimes under some form of the collective Iroquois name Toagenha, but generally under their Algonquian name Chaouanon. La Harpe, about 1715, called them Tongarois, another form of Toagenha. All these writers concur in the statement that they lived upon a large southern branch of the Ohio, at no great distance e. of the Mississippi. This was the Cumberland r. of Tennessee and Kentucky, which is called the River of the Shawnee on all the old maps down to about the year 1770. When the French traders first came into the region the Shawnee had their principal village on that river near the present Nashville, Tenn. They seem also to have ranged northeastward to Kentucky r. and southward to the Tennessee. It will thus be seen that they were not isolated from the great body of the Algonquian tribes, as has frequently been represented to have been the case, but simply occupied an interior position, adjoining the kindred Illinois and Miami, with whom they kept up constant communication. As previously mentioned, the early maps plainly distinguish these Shawnee on the Cumberland from the other division of the tribe on Savannah r.

These western Shawnee are mentioned about the year 1672 as being harassed by the Iroquois, and also as allies and neighbors of the Andaste, or Conestoga, who were themselves at war with the Iroquois. As the Andaste were then incorrectly supposed to live on the upper waters of the Ohio r., the Shawnee would naturally be considered their neighbors. The two tribes were probably in alliance against the Iroquois, as we find that when the first body of Shawnee removed from South Carolina to Pennsylvania, about 1678, they settled adjoining the Conestoga, and when another part of the same tribe desired to remove to the Delaware in 1694 permission was granted on condition that they make peace with the Iroquois. Again, in 1684, the Iroquois justified their attacks on the Miami by asserting that the latter had invited the Satanas (Shawnee) into their country to make war upon the Iroquois. This is the first historic mention of the Shawnee—evidently the western division—in the country n. of the Ohio r. As the Cumberland region was out of the usual course of exploration and settlement, but few notices of the western Shawnee are found until 1714, when the French trader Charleville established himself among them near the present Nashville. They were then gradually leaving the country in small bodies in consequence of a war with the Cherokee, their former allies, who were assisted by the Chickasaw. From the statement of Iberville in 1702 (Margry, Déc., iv, 519, 1880) it seems that this was due to the latter's efforts to bring them more closely under French influence. It is impossible now to learn the cause of the war between the Shawnee and the Cherokee. It probably did not begin until after 1707, the year of the final expulsion of the Shawnee from South Carolina by the Catawba, as there is no evidence to show that the Cherokee took part in that struggle. From Shawnee tradition the quarrel with the Chickasaw would seem to be of older date. After the reunion of the Shawnee in the N. they secured the alliance of the Delawares, and the two tribes turned against the Cherokee until the latter were compelled to ask peace, when the old friendship was renewed. Soon after the coming of Charleville, in 1714, the Shawnee finally abandoned the Cumberland valley, being pursued to the last moment by the Chickasaw. In a council held at Philadelphia in 1715 with the Shawnee and Delawares, the former, "who live at a great distance," asked the friendship of the Pennsylvania government. These are evidently the same who about this time were driven from their home on Cumberland r. On Moll's map of 1720 we find this region marked as occupied by the Cherokee, while "Savannah Old Settlement" is placed at the mouth of the Cumberland, indicating that the removal of the Shawnee had then been completed. They stopped for some time at various points in Kentucky, and perhaps also at Shawneetown, Ill., but finally, about the year 1730, collected along the N. bank of the Ohio r., in Ohio and Pennsylvania, extending from the Allegheny down to the Scioto. Sawcunk, Logstown, and Lowertown were probably built about this time. The land thus occupied was claimed by the Wyandot, who granted permission to the Shawnee to settle upon it, and many years afterward threatened to dispossess them if they continued hostilities against the United States. They probably wandered for some time in Kentucky, which was practically a part of their own territory and not occupied by any other tribe. Blackhoof (Catahecassa), one of their most celebrated chiefs, was born during this sojourn in a village near the present Winchester, Ky. Down to the treaty of Greenville, in 1795, Kentucky was the favorite huntingground of the tribe. In 1748 the Shawnee on the Ohio were estimated to number 162 warriors or about 600 souls. A few years later they were joined by their kindred from the Susquehanna, and the two bands were united for the first time in history. There is no evidence that the western band, as a body, ever crossed to the E. side of the mountains. The nature of the country and the fear of the Catawba would seem to have forbidden such a movement, aside from the fact that their eastern brethren were already beginning to feel the pressure of advancing civilization. The most natural line of migration was the direct route to the upper Ohio, where they had the protection of the Wyandot and Miami, and were within easy reach of the French.

For a long time an intimate connection existed between the Creeks and the Shawnee, and a body of the latter, under the name of Sawanogi, was permanently incorporated with the Creeks. These may have been the ones mentioned by Pénicaut as living in the vicinity of Mobile about 1720. Bartram (Travels, 464, 1792), in 1773, mentioned this band among the Creeks and spoke of the resemblance of their language to that of the Shawnee, without knowing that they were a part of the same tribe. The war in the N. W. after the close of the Revolution drove still more of the Shawnee to take refuge with the Creeks. In 1791 they had 4 villages in the Creek country, near the site of Montgomery, Ala., the principal being Sawanogi. A great many also joined the hostile Cherokee about the same time. As these villages are not named in the list of Creek towns in 1832 it is possible that their inhabitants may have joined the rest of their tribe in the W. before that period. There is no good evidence for the assertion by some writers that the Suwanee in Florida took its name from a band of Shawnee once settled upon its banks.

The history of the Shawnee after their reunion on the Ohio is well known as a part of the history of the Northwest territory, and may be dismissed with brief notice. For a period of 40 years—from the beginning of the French and Indian war to the treaty of Greenville in 1795—they were almost constantly at war with the English or the Americans, and distinguished themselves as the most hostile tribe in that region. Most of the expeditions sent across the Ohio during the Revolutionary period were directed against the Shawnee, and most of the destruction on the Kentucky frontier was the work of the same tribe. When driven back from the Scioto they retreated to the head of the Miami r., from which the Miami had withdrawn some years before. After the Revolution, finding themselves left without the assistance of the British, large numbers joined the hostile Cherokee and Creeks in the S., while a considerable body accepted the invitation of the Spanish government in 1793 and settled, together with some Delawares, on a tract near Cape Girardeau, Mo., between the Mississippi and the Whitewater rs., in what was then Spanish territory. Wayne's victory, followed by the treaty of Greenville in 1795, put an end to the long war in the Ohio valley. The Shawnee were obliged to give up their territory on the Miami in Ohio, and retired to the headwaters of the Auglaize. The more hostile part of the tribe crossed the Mississippi and joined those living at Cape Girardeau. In 1798 a part of those in Ohio settled on White r. in Indiana, by invitation of the Delawares. A few years later a Shawnee medicine-man, Tenskwatawa (q. v.), known as The Prophet, the brother of the celebrated Tecumseh (q. v.), began to preach a new doctrine among the various tribes of that region. His followers rapidly increased and established themselves in a village at the mouth of the Tippecanoe r. in Indiana. It soon became evident that his intentions were hostile, and a force was sent against him under Gen. Harrison in 1811, resulting in the destruction of the village and the total defeat of the Indians in the decisive battle of Tippecanoe. Tecumseh was among the Creeks at the time, endeavoring to secure their aid against the United States, and returned in time to take command of the N. W. tribes in the British interest in the War of 1812. The Shawnee in Missouri, who formed about half of the tribe, are said to have had no part in this struggle. By the death of Tecumseh in this war the spirit of the Indian tribes was broken, and most of them accepted terms of peace soon after. The Shawnee in Missouri sold their lands in 1825 and removed to a reservation in Kansas. A large part of them had previously gone to Texas, where they settled on the headwaters of the Sabine r., and remained there until driven out about 1839 (see Cherokee). The Shawnee of Ohio sold their remaining lands at Wapakoneta and Hog Creek in 1831, and joined those in Kansas. The mixed band of Seneca and Shawnee at Lewistown, Ohio, also removed to Kansas about the same time. A large part of the tribe left Kansas about 1845 and settled on Canadian r., Indian Ter. (Oklahoma), where they are now known as Absentee Shawnee. In 1867 the Shawnee living with the Seneca removed also from Kansas to the Territory and are now known as Eastern Shawnee. In 1869, by intertribal agreement, the main body became incorporated with the Cherokee Nation in the present Oklahoma, where they are now residing. Those known as Black Bob's band refused to remove from Kansas with the others, but have since joined them.

The Shawnee have 5 divisions, which may be regarded as phratries, or perhaps as originally distinct tribes, and the members of these divisions occupied different sides of the council house in their public assemblies. Their names are Chilacahtha (Chillicothe), Kispokotha (Kispogogi), Spitotha (Mequachake?), Bicowetha (Piqua), and Assiwikale (Hathawekela). The villages of the tribe have generally taken their names from these divisions. The Woketamosi division mentioned by Heckewelder is probably one of these, but is not the Piqua.

According to Morgan (Anc. Soc., 168, 1877) the Shawnee have 13 clans, as follows: M'-wa-wä', wolf; Ma-gwä', loon; M'-kwä', bear; We-wä'-see, buzzard; M'-se'-pa-se, panther; M'-ath-wa', owl; Pa-la-wä', turkey; Psake-the', deer; Shapä-tä', raccoon; Na-ma-thä', turtle; Man-na-to', snake; Pe-sa-wä', horse; Pä-tüke-e-no-the', rabbit. The Turtle clan occupies an important place in their mythologic traditions. At a conference in 1793 the Shawnee signed with the snake totem.

The early estimates of the numbers of the Shawnee are only partial, owing to the fact that the tribe was not united. The highest estimate given is that of 1817, which places them at 2,000 souls. Others are 1,750 (1732); 1,000 (1736); 1,500 (1759, 1765, 1778, 1783, 1794, 1812); 1,900 on Auglaize r. (1794); 1,600 (1812; one-half in Missouri). In 1909 the Eastern Shawnee numbered 107; the Absentee Shawnee 481; and those incorporated with the Cherokee Nation about 800, making, with a few individuals, resident Cherokee, a present total of about 1,400 for the tribe, a considerable decrease in the last twenty years.

The following were the Shawnee villages so far as recorded: Bulltown, Catawissa, Chillicothe (several), Conedogwinet, Cornstalk's Town, Girty's Town, Grenadier Squaw's Town, Hog Creek, Kaghoughsage, Kickenapawling, Lewistown (with Mingos), Lick Town(?), Logstown (with others), Long Tail, Lowertown, Mequachake (several), Nawake(?), Old Shawnee Town, Peixtan(?), Pigeon Town, Piqua (Pequea; several), Prophet's Town, Sawanogi, Scoutash, Shawneetown (Ill.), Sonnioto, Standing Stone, Tippecanoe, Wapakoneta, Will's Town. Shawnee Cabins. A prominent landmark on the traders' trail between Rays Town (Bedford, Pa.) and the Ohio r. in the 18th century, situated 8 m. w. of the site of Bedford and not far from the present Schellburg. It was first settled by the Shawnee as they came northward from the Potomac early in the 18th century, and was a well-known point on the Indian trail when the traders of Pennsylvania commenced to visit the Ohio. James Le Tort was perhaps the first trader to go westward over this route, having traversed it as early as 1701; in 1712 he was granted a license as a trader by the Provincial Council (Col. Rec. Pa., ii, 562, 1852). Conrad Weiser passed through in 1748 on his way to Logstown (ibid., v, 348, 1851). The locality is noted on all early maps of Pennsylvania and is mentioned in nearly all the traders' journals. (G. P. D.)

Shell, Shellwork. Shell was a favorite material with the aborigines all over America for the manufacture of implements, utensils, and ornaments; and shells in their natural state or merely notched or perforated for attachment were, on account of their beauty of form and color (Marginella, Olivella, Natica, etc.), extensively used for personal embellishment. Among the tribes N. of trimmed, ground, and polished and perforated for beads, pins, pendants, and breastplates or gorgets. The column of the conch was cut up into sections and ground down into rude beads. Much skill was shown in boring these, and cylinders 3 in. or more in length were perforated longitudinally by means of drills of unknown make. Along the Atlantic coast

Mexico clam and mussel shells (Venus, Mya, Anodon, Unio, etc.) served for cups and spoons, were hafted for scraping and digging, and worked up into fish-hooks, knives, and other minor implements. The large conchs (Strombus, Cassia, Fulgur, etc.) were used as drinking vessels after the interior portions had been removed, and in Florida they were hafted as clubs and picks. In many sections the thick walls were cut up to be shaped by tedious processes of scraping, grinding, and drilling with stone tools into celts, adzes, gouges, scrapers, and plummets. Ornaments of shell were exceedingly varied in form, and the clam, unio, conch, and many of the larger shells in the E., and like forms, and more especially the beautiful abalone (Haliotis) of the Pacific coast, were cut up, clam shells (Venus mercenaria) were made into small cylindrical beads, which were strung as necklaces and woven into belts, and in colonial times served as a medium of exchange (see Wampum). A most interesting example of the use of small shells for ornament is given by Tylor (Internat. Archiv f. Ethnogr., I, 215, 1888) and Bushnell (Am. Anthr., ix, 38-39, 1907).

It is a deer skin mantle, on which figures of a man and two quadrupeds, accompanied by a number of round figures, are worked in marginella shells. The specimen has been in English hands for upward of 250 years, and was obtained by early colonists from the Powhatan Indians. Bivalve shells from the Pacific coast, and also possibly from the Gulf of Mexico, were much used by the tribes of the Pueblo region for various ornaments, and especially for beads, which were very highly prized.

SHELL CELT; FLORIDA (1-4)

Some of the objects were neatly carved, the frog being frequently imitated in pendant ornaments. Dentalium shells were strung as beads by the coast tribes, and formed an important article of trade with those of the interior. On the Pacific coast the larger varieties of clam shell (Tivela, Saxidomus) were employed in the manufacture of beads and other objects, and the abalone was in universal demand for personal ornaments; and baskets and other objects of use and ornament were decked with pendants made of it. This shell was in very general use for settings and inlaying, and was and is employed for these purposes with excellent effect by the tribes of the N. W. coast. The oper-culum of a species of Turbinidae (Pachypoma inaequale) was also used in like manner by the tribes of the N. W. coast.

Probably the most effective and important ornaments of shell employed by the mound-building tribes were disks, highly polished, curved, or engraved with designs, and suspended on the chest or from the ears. The designs on these are especially noteworthy, many being evidently symbolic and depicting serpents, birds, spiders, dancing figures in elaborate costume, etc. Some of these, found in mounds in the middle Mississippi valley region, have designs closely resem-

Shells and objects made of shell served as an important feature of trade between the coast and inland tribes, and in many localities were used as money. The conch sources that some varieties of shell, including the conch, were employed by the natives of the E., S., and S. W. for trumpets, and also on occasion in ceremony and as votive offerings. Fossil shells, many of which are quite equal in beauty of form and color to the living species, were much prized by the Indians; they served as fetishes and charms, and are feet or more. Though sometimes approximately homogeneous throughout, there are generally evidences of stratification in the greater deposits, and layers of earth and other refuse are intercalated with the shells. In some cases the lower strata are in an advanced stage of decay, indicating the lapse of a long period of time since their deposition.

The cultural contents of the normal middens furnish a very striking record of the arts and industries, habits, and customs of the tribes concerned in their accumulation. Ordinary implements of stone, bone, shell, wood, and metal are embedded with the shells, and it is not unusual to encounter at various levels traces of ancient lodge sites, each marked by a central fireplace encircled by accumulations of dark earth and ridges of shell refuse. Lodge-site depressions are also traceable on the surface of the heaps where the plow has not effaced them. It is observed that in some of the deposits remains of art are rare or apparently absent, while in others of equal size and possibly greater antiquity artifacts are plentiful. Fragmentary earthenware is abundant in many of the heaps of eastern United States and usually corresponds somewhat closely with that of the village sites of the general region; but in the salt-water accumulations the pottery is often exceptionally rude in make. This may be measurably accounted for on the theory that the shell-heap sites were in many cases not permanent abodes and that inferior vessels were constructed for local and temporary use.

The shell-heaps of New England, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward id. are numerous and cover considerable areas, but usually have no great depth. (See Peninsular Shellmound, Whaleback Shellmound.) They contain shells of several varieties, including the oyster to a limited extent, the common clam (Mya arenaria), the quahog (Venus mercenaria), the scallop, the mussel, the cockle, the whelk, and other varieties (Chase, Mercer, Morse, Rau, Wyman). The deposits include vast numbers of the simple implements, utensils (including some pottery), and ornaments of the tribes, and these are well represented in the collections of the Peabody Museum, the American Museum of Natural History, and the National Museum. The theory that the Eskimo formerly occupied the coast as far s. as Maine has led to the search for definite traces of this people in the shell-heaps, but so far no decisive evidence has been obtained. The shell-heaps of New York and New Jersey closely resemble those of New England, and have been described by Abbott, Leidy, Rau, and Tooker. Those of Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas are numerous and extensive. The oyster-shell deposits at Popes cr. on the Potomac, for example, cover 30 acres or more, and were 15 ft in depth over a considerable area before the removal of shells for fertilizing purposes began (Holmes, Reynolds). Equally important deposits occur along the shores of the Chesapeake, as at Still pond, on the eastern shore (Jordan). A mound situated on Stallings id. in the Savannah r., below Augusta, Ga., affords an excellent illustration of the use of midden deposits in the construction of burial mounds. It is described as 15 ft in height and 120 by 300 ft in horizontal extent; as consisting of mussel, clam, and snail (Paludina) shells, and as containing hundreds of skeletons deposited in successive layers (C. C. Jones). The shell-heaps of the Georgia coast are not particularly noteworthy, but the coast of Florida abounds in these deposits, those at Turtle mound, Charlotte Harbor, and Cedar Keys being of gigantic proportions. Those along the Atlantic coast of the peninsula are composed chiefly of oyster shells; but on the w. coast, besides the oyster there are several genera of the conchs, including Busycon, Strombus, Fulgur, Fasciolaria, and other shells (Brinton, Cushing, Moore, Wyman). One mound on Tampa bay is upward of 30 ft in height and covers an island of 8 acres in extent. The deposits of the northern margin of the gulf, in Louisiana and Mississippi, described by Foster, Lyell, Moore, Vanuxem, and others, include, besides the oyster, particularly the clam (Gnathodom cuneatus).

The inland fresh-water shell-heaps of Florida are composed of distinct genera of shells—Ampullaria, Paludina, Unio, etc. On St Johns r. a fresh-water snail (Viripara georgiana) is everywhere the principal, and in many cases the almost exclusive, species. Many of the deposits are of great size, although they are accumulations of kitchen refuse pure and simple. The mound at Bluffton has 30 acres of shells and reaches a height of 25 ft above the river level (Moore). Mount Taylor and others are of nearly equal importance. All contain examples of such artifacts of stone, shell, bone, and metal as were used by the shell-heap people. Stone implements are rather rare, and pottery occurs in considerable quantities in most of the deposits, especially on and near the surface. Many of the shell-heaps, especially of Florida, present the appearance of great age, and the growth on them of live oaks of the largest size indicates that the deposits had reached their present dimensions before, perhaps long before, the discovery of America. It is also noted that the shells at the lower levels have become consolidated, and that bones embedded with them have lost their organic matter (Wyman), conditions indicative of very considerable age. Great age is also suggested by changes in the river courses, the erosion of bluffs, and the formation of swamps since the period of the midden accumulation, as well as by changes in the character of the shells themselves. Dr Pilsbry, discussing the bearing of the observed faunal changes on the question of antiquity, states that there was a marked change in the characteristics of the shells during the period of formation of certain of the shell-fields. At the lower levels in the Juniper cr. mounds,

Mr Moore states that in the shell-mounds he has observed no evidence of a succession of distinct peoples or widely variant cultures; that certain of the great mounds contain no pottery whatever; that in others pottery-making came in during the period of their accumulation, while in still others earthenware is distributed in somewhat varying forms with the different layers from base to summit. There is, he believes, satisfactory evidence of progress in culture, and, withal, evidence of great age, not, however, of a nature to lead to the belief that the occupancy of Florida extended to a previous geological period. As a result of

for example, a dominant species of the shells used is the normal Unipara georgiana. Near the surface a divergent form (altior) appears and prevails. At another point a variety known as limnothauma appears, the most strongly characterized individuals being at or near the surface. "We have no definite standards whereby to measure the time required for the evolution of new species or varieties and their establishment as dominant local forms; but judging by the amount of change in the mollusca since the deposition of such post-Glacial deposits as the Loess, we can not escape the conclusion that a long period is indicated."—H. A. Pilsbry, in a letter addressed to Clarence B. Moore, in response to inquiries.

the investigations of Wyman and Moore an estimate of a thousand years may safely be given as a minimum for the occupancy of Florida by the aborigines.

The shell-heaps of the rivers flowing into the Gulf on the N., and those of the eastern tributaries of the Mississippi, are numerous and extensive. They are composed of the local fresh-water shells, especially the mussels (Unio) and snails (Paludina), and contain characteristic art remains of the region, and in very many cases the osseous remains of the vertebrate animals utilized for food. On the Tennessee and Cumberland rs., especially in their middle courses, are extensive deposits that reach a depth of 10 ft or more. They have not been adequately studied and described, but have received casual attention by a number of authors (Foster, Maximilian, Stelle, Lyell, MacLean, Thruston, Jos. Jones, Thomas, McWhorter). Midden deposits do not occur to any great extent about the shores of the Great Lakes or along the rivers of the middle west and the Rocky mtn. region, but are numerous and important on the Pacific coast. Between N. California and

PARTIAL SECTION OF THE POPE'S CREEK SHELL-HEAP, SHOWING THE UNIFORM CHARACTER OF THE SHELLS

Alaska the shells are the mussel, oyster, clam, haliotis, nautilus, and other less conspicuous varieties (Bancroft, Dall, Eells, Schumacher, Yarrow, Yates, and authors in Univ. Cal. Pub. in Am. Archæol. and Ethnol.).

The shell-heaps of Alaska have been described by Dall and are remarkable as representing 3 successive periods of occupancy: the first, designated the littoral period, is characterized by the almost exclusive use of the Echinus drobachianus and the absence of human handiwork; the second is called the fishing period, the deposits being composed largely of fish bone and containing traces of very primitive forms of stone implements; and the third is called the hunting period, in which the food supply was much varied, including prominently the game animals of the region, the culture having approached that of the Alaskan tribes of the historic period. The deposits are numerous, but do not compare in extent with those of the more southerly shores. Dr Dall, weighing the evidence carefully, reaches the conclusion that a period approximating 3,000 years is represented.

SHEMAUKAN (Shimdgān, 'lance,' 'sword.'—Gerard). The largest of the Cree bands in 1856, at which period they occupied 350 tipis. They roamed and hunted in the Cypress and Prickly-pear mts., s. w. Assiniboia, Canada, but occasionally visited Missouri r. for trade. They took their name from a chief, otherwise known as The Lance.

Shenango. The name of several Indian settlements, widely separated in situation. One was on the n. bank of the Ohio r., a short distance below the site of the present Economy, Beaver co., Pa., and at one time was an important trading-post, but after the capture of Ft Duquesne and the erection of Ft Pitt by the English in 1758, it gradually lost its importance, and early in the Revolutionary war it was wholly abandoned. It was at this place, called by them Logs Town, that Weiser and Croghan held in 1748 the first treaty with the western Indians, which apparently led to Céloron's expedition to the Ohio in the following year. This French expedition awakened Virginia to the great importance of retaining possession of the Ohio country; her activity in this direction in turn resulted in the French and Indian war six years later. In 1749 Céloron, with his expedition to the Ohio, found about 50 lodges there, while Bonnecamps estimated 80, occupied by "Iroquois, Shawnee, and Loups; also Iroquois from the Sault St Louis and Lake of the Two Mountains, with some Nippissingues, Abenakis, and Ottawas." Bonnecamps says that "we called it Chiningué, from its vicinity to a river of that name." At the time of this expedition it had been established for only 5 or 6 years, and was occupied almost wholly by Iroquois. General Wayne with his "Legion of the United States" encamped on its site from Nov. 1792 to Apr. 20, 1793, from which fact it became known as Legionville.

Probably following the Nuremberg map of 1756, Mitchell's map of 1755, and D'Anville's map of about 1775, the name was applied to the site of Warren, Pa., a place on which Céloron found a village called Kananouangon (Conewango) with 12 or 13 cabins (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., x, 249, 1858). Parkman makes the statement that at different times in the Ohio valley there have been 3 distinct villages called Shenango: one situated at the junction of the Conewango and the Allegheny, then the first one described above, and the third, some distance up the Big Beaver, near the Kuskuski of Hutchins' map of 1764, on which it is written Shaningo, being about 60 m. from Ft Pitt (Jes. Rel., Thwaites ed., LXIX, note 40, 1900). Shenango is also a form of Chenango (q. v.), the name of a former Iroquois town in Broome co., N. Y., situated on Chenango r., 4 m. above its junction with the Susquehanna, and which was evacuated and partly burned by the Indians in the winter of 1778-79. It contained about 20 cabins. Halsey (Old N. Y. Frontier, 276, map, 1901) locates two villages where only one has hitherto been recognized as Shenango, the one on the Chenango r. about 4 m. above, and the other just below its junction with the Susquehanna. The one he writes Otseningo, and the other Ochenang on the map and Chenang in the text. See Logstown. (J. N. B. H.)

With the locative suffix, Shëshêkwanînk, 'at the gourd rattle.' The name probably had reference to some practices of the pagan Indians who lived at the place so named.—Gerard). A former Iroquois town with a mixed population, dominantly Seneca, but including also Delawares or Munsee, situated in 1772 about 6 m. below Tioga Point, Bradford co., Pa. It was the home of the notorious Queen Esther, the "fiend of Wyoming," who about this time removed northward 6 m., forming a new settlement that later became known as Queen Esther's Town, and which was destroyed by Col. Hartley in 1778, whereupon the Queen fled, probably to Chemung, Chemung co., N. Y. Sheshequin was situated on the e. side of Susquehanna r., on the site of the present Ulster, Bradford co., Pa., and was divided into two parts by Cash cr., the northern part being heathen, the southern Moravian Christian Indians; it was the former who removed 6 m. higher, while the latter went to Friedensstadt. Shickshack. A Winnebago chief, prominent in the history of the Sangamon country in Illinois, whose name is said to signify 'rising sun.' He is first heard of in 1819, having come down from the N. to the Sangamon country to avoid the constant hostility between his people and the Chippewa; here he made many friends among the white settlers. In 1820 he was chief of a band of about 40 families with a village on the s. side of Sangamon r., 25 m. above its mouth, and about 12 m. w. of New Salem, Ill. A high, dome-shaped hill near the Indian village was called "Shickshack's Knob," and is still known by that name. In 1827, on hearing of the trouble between the Indians and the whites, which culminated in the Black Hawk war, Shickshack and his people departed for the northern part of the state. He was seen at Dixon's Ferry in 1832, where he had come, he explained, to meet some of his old friends among the soldiers, and it is said that he was among the friendly Winnebago who captured Black Hawk and placed him in the custody of United States troops. At the close of the war the Winnebago concluded a treaty with the United States and removed w. of the Mississippi, finally settling in Kansas, and it is supposed that Shickshack and his immediate followers accompanied them. In appearance Shickshack was erect, muscular and active, of medium height and weight; his expression, harsh and unpleasant, did not accord with his jovial and sympathetic disposition. He had two wives, one a Winnebago and one a Kickapoo, and four children. Mrs Mary Catherwood has made him a prominent character in her novel, "Spanish Peggy," in which she represents him as the intimate friend of Abraham Lincoln. See Snyder in Jour. Ill. State Hist. Soc., II, no. 3, 1909.

Shields. The shield was a regular part of the defensive equipment of the Indian warrior of the open country of the plains and the arid S. W., as well as farther s. in Mexico, but was found only occasionally among the Eastern tribes, not being adapted to use in a region of timber and thick undergrowth. Shields of bark or netted willow or cane are mentioned among the Iroquois, the Virginia tribes, and the Carolina tribes as far back as De Soto's expedition, 1539. The cuirass and other forms of body armor took the place of the shield among the eastern and northern tribes generally on the Arctic coast and in the Canadian N. W., and along the Pacific coast southward into California, and were found also among the Pueblos, and more anciently among the Navaho. (See Armor.)

17 in. The ordinary material was thick buffalo hide, with one or two covers of soft dressed buffalo, elk, or deer skin, but a few instances are known of shields of netted rods covered with soft dressed skin, the supposed protecting power in such cases being wholly due to the "medicine." The design upon the outside cover was different from that upon the inside cover, which last was exposed only at the moment of going into the fight, by loosening and throwing back the outside cover. The protecting "medicine" and the head and bridle pendant were usually kept between the two covers. The shield was carried upon the left arm by means of a belt passing over the shoulder, in such a way as to permit the free use of the left hand to grasp the bow, or could be slung around to the back in a retreat. It was sufficient to stop an arrow or turn the stroke of a lance, but afforded but slight protection against a bullet. The Pima, Navaho, and Pueblo shield, intended for use on foot rather than on horse, was usually of large size, cut from a single piece of thick hide, without cover, and was sometimes fitted with a wooden hand-grasp on the inner side. In ancient times Pueblo shields were made also of basketry. The Pima shield was frequently painted with a design resembling the swastika cross, a favorite symbol in the tribe. The shields of the Zuni Priests of the Bow seem to have been intended for ceremonial purposes rather than for war.

The shield of the Plains warrior constituted his most sacred possession from the time when it was made for him, or given to him soon after his first encounter with the enemy, until it was laid under his head in the grave, unless before that time bestowed on some worthy younger warrior or left as a precious sacrifice at the grave of wife or child. Every shield originated from a dream, in which the dreamer was told by the spirit how many shields he might make, how they must be painted and decorated, how the owner must paint and otherwise decorate himself and his pony, and what taboos and other sacred obligations he must observe through life in order to obtain the protection of the shield spirit, which might be a bird, a quadruped, a being of the tribal pantheon, or one of the personified powers of nature. The owner rarely made his own shield, but received it from the dreamer, usually an old warrior or recognized medicine-man, who made it on request as he had been instructed, for a definite compensation in horses, blankets, or other property. The hide used for the purpose was taken from the neck of the buffalo bull, and was made exceptionally thick and tough by shrinking it, while wet, over a fire built in a hole in the ground. The cutting, painting, and decorating with feathers and other pendants were all matters of much ceremony, in which the maker was assisted by the candidate and by other shield owners, usually those carrying shields of the same pattern. During the progress of the work the young man was instructed in all the obligations connected with the shield, and at its completion the shield was formally consecrated in a sweat-house built for the purpose, and the whole ceremony concluded with a feast. The obligations included certain taboos, prayers, songs, and war cries, with a specific method of caring for the shield when in camp and of uncovering it before going into the fight. When not in use it was hung upon a tripod, usually facing the sun, or tied upon an upright pole. (J. M.)

SHIELD OF THE ZUNI

Shikeldaptikh (Ciq/x.laptir, 'there is a gap or gulch'). A former village of the Tlakuit, $\frac{1}{2}$ m. below The Dalles of Columbia r., Wash. (E. S.)

Shikellamy (a highly Anglicized form of the Delaware translation of the Oneida chieftain title Oñgwaterra'hat'he' (Ung-qua-terughiathe), signifying 'It has caused the sky to be light or bright for us.' The cognate form of the Delaware term is Kijidnamdnew (n=Delaware I), meaning 'He causes it to be light or daylight for him,' or 'He lights, enlightens him.' The forms of the name ending in us (see below) are due to a Latinism by the Moravian writers rather than to the original native form of the name. Those ending in o, a, or y are forms employed by English writers, and probably are approximately nearer the original native term than those ending in us. Another Iroquoian name applied to this chieftain is Swataney, a highly Anglicized form of Oñkhi'swathe''tani', signifying 'He causes it to be light for us,' and, figuratively, 'He enlightens it for us,' or as an appellation, 'Our Enlightener'. An Oneida chieftain. According to Bartram he was "an adopted Frenchman," born in Montreal, who had been captured and adopted by the Oneida, although he claimed to be a Cayuga. He was the exponent of the colonial policy of the great federal Iroquois council at Onondaga, and was sent by it to the forks of the Susquehanna in 1728 to conserve the interests of the Six Nations in the valley of the Susquehanna and to keep watch over the tributary Shawnee and Delaware Indians. He was a man of great dignity, sobriety, and prudence, and at all times showed marked kindness to the whites, especially to the missionaries. In the execution of his trust Shikellamy conducted many important embassies between the government of Pennsylvania and the Iroquois council at Onondaga, and he also attended many if not most of the councils held at Philadelphia, Conestoga, and elsewhere in the performance of his duties. The importance of his office is evident from the fact that the valley of the Susquehanna, after the Conestoga were subjugated in 1676 by the Iroquois, was assigned by the Five Nations of Iroquois as a hunting ground to the Shawnee, Delawares, Conoy, Nanticoke, Munsee, Tutelo, Saponi, and Conestoga tribes. When the Mohawk sold the Wyoming region in Pennsylvania to the Susquehanna Land Co., although this tribe had never aided in the conquests made in this valley, the council at Onondaga began to realize that this section, with its valuable lands and many dependent tribes, was worthy of careful attention; hence these tribes were made to understand that in the future they must transact all business with the proprietary government solely through their deputy. With his residence fixed at Shamokin (now Sunbury), Pa., Shikellamy was promoted in 1745 to the full vicegerency over the tributary tribes in the Susquehanna valley, and intricate and important interests committed to him received the care of an astute statesman and diplomat. The effects of the liquor traffic on the Indians led to prohibitory decrees on the part of the government of Pennsylvania, and later, evidently through the influence of traders, when these prohibitory measures became lax, Shikellamy in 1731 delivered an ultimatum to the Pennsylvania government to the effect that unless the liquor trade should be better regulated with regard to its sale among his people, friendly relations between the proprietary government and the Six Nations would cease. As the difficulties arising from the sale of liquor had forced a large number of Shawnee to migrate from the Susquehanna to the Ohio r. in 1730, and as French emissaries were taking advantage of this condition to alienate the Shawnee from the English interest, the Governor decided in 1731 to send Shikellamy, "a trusty, good man, and a great lover of the English," to Onondaga to invite the Six Nations to Philadelphia, with a view of securing the friendship and alliance of the Six Nations in order to keep the Shawnee in the English interest; but owing to the mistrust the Six Nations had of the motives of the English, they did not send a deputation until August, 1732, and even then there were delegates from only three of the tribes, who professed to speak for the others, consequently the conference was unsatisfactory. In 1736 Shikellamy's influence was enlisted to bring about a conference in which would be represented the entire confederation of the Six Nations, and in less than two months' time Conrad Weiser was enabled to inform the Governor of Pennsylvania that more than a hundred chiefs of the Iroquois with their retinues were on their way to Philadelphia. By this treaty of 1736 the Six Nations, in consideration of a large consignment of merchandise, deeded all their Susquehanna lands s. and e. of the Blue mtns. Some weeks later, when nearly all the leading Indians had departed, another deed was prepared and signed by the remaining Indians, which purported to include the lands ostensibly claimed by the Six Nations within the drainage of Delaware r. s. of the Blue mtns.—a treaty that, says Walton, "established a precedent for an Iroquois claim to lands owned by the Delaware Indians," a claim that had never hitherto been advanced. "No doubt," says Walton, "Shikelimy was the Indian agent who accomplished this, and that he used Conrad Weiser to bring it to pass. Weiser helped Shikelimy sow the seed which drenched Pennsylvania in blood from 1755 to 1764. In permitting this second deed Pennsylvania started that series of events with the Delawares which cost her one of the most remarkable Indian invasions in colonial history. And at the same time by securing this and thus conciliating the Iroquois, and holding the key to their future attitude, Weiser and the proprietary government made a future nation possible. Pennsylvania suffered that a nation might live. She brought upon herself after many years a Delaware war, but escaped a Six-Nation war, a French alliance with the Iroquois, and the threatening possibility of the destruction of all the English colonies on the coast." Shikellamy did not sign the treaty of 1744, because, it appears, he was determined not to recognize the claims of Maryland to lands N. of the disputed boundary.

Weiser had many good reasons for regarding Shikellamy as the key to the secret policies of the council of the Iroquois at Onondaga, hence in 1745, when Shikellamy was requested by Governor Thomas to visit Onondaga for the purpose of inducing the Six Nations to agree to a peace with the Catawba, Weiser took an offering with which to "wipe away" the faithful old chieftain's tears for the death of his son, "Unhappy Jake," among the Catawba; for until this was done the chieftain could not devote attention to public affairs. Having thus comforted the aged chieftain, he set out in company with Andrew Montour, Shikellamy and son, in May, 1745, for Onondaga, where he was kindly received, but was able to learn only that the Six Nations favored peace with the Catawba.

On the acquisition of firearms by the Indians, the smiths of the white people became a necessity to the Indian hunter and warrior. On account of the remoteness of these conveniences from the Indian country, Shikellamy persuaded the colonial government to establish a forge at Shamokin. This was granted on condition that the Indians would permit the Moravians to begin a mission at that place, which the missionaries regarded as the greatest stronghold of paganism. To this proposal Shikellamy readily consented, and in April, 1747, a smithy and a mission house were erected there. A year later, Zeisberger, who had become proficient in the Mohawk tongue, became an assistant missionary at Shamokin, and while there began the preparation of an Onondaga dictionary under the interested instruction of Shikellamy. During this year (1748) Shikellamy received from Count Zinzendorf a silver knife, fork, and spoon, and an ivory drinking cup richly mounted in silver, accompanied with a message entreating him to hold fast to the gospel which he had heard from the count's own lips. This resulted in the conversion of Shikellamy at Bethlehem shortly afterward; he was not baptized by the Moravians, however, because he had been baptized many years before by a Jesuit priest in Canada. On his way to Shamokin he fell ill of fever and ague at Tulpehocking and had barely strength to reach his home. Zeisberger, who had returned to his post, ministered to the stricken chieftain until his death, Dec. 6, 1748. The colonial government sent a message of condolence, with the usual presents to the family, and requested the eldest son of Shikellamy, John or Thachnechtoris (Taghneghdoarus) to serve as the Iroquois deputy governor until the council at Onondaga could make a permanent appointment. Another son of Shikellamy was James Logan (q. v.).

Shinana. A ruined pueblo, probably of the Tigua, on the Rio Grande, in the vicinity of Albuquerque, N. Mex.—Loew (1875) in Wheeler Surv. Rep., vii, 338, 1879.

Shinats. A former summer village of the Laguna tribe, situated 3½ m. s. of the present Laguna pueblo, N. Mex. It is said to have been abandoned on account of Apache depredations. (F. W. H.)

Shingabawassin (Shingabewasin, 'reclining human figure of stone.'—W. J.). A Chippewa chief of the Crane gens, born about 1763, and prominent during the first quarter of the 19th century. He was the eldest son of Maidosagee, the son of Gitcheojeedebun. His residence, during most of his years at least, was on the banks of St Mary's r., Mich., at the outlet of L. Superior. His life, so far as known, was characterized by but few marked incidents, though largely spent in behalf of the welfare of his people. During his younger days he took an active part in the war expeditions of his band, especially those against the Sioux, but after assuming the responsibilities of his official life he became a strong advocate of peace. At the councils convened for the purpose of entering into treaties, especially those at Prairie du Chien in 1825, Fond du Lac in 1826, and Butte des Mortes in 1827, he was the leading speaker and usually the most important person among the Indian delegates. He seems to have risen, to a large extent, above the primitive beliefs of his people, and even went so far in one of the councils as to advise making known to the whites the situation of the great copper deposits, although these were regarded by the Indians as sacred. A favorite scheme which he advanced and vigorously advocated, but without effect, was to have the United States set apart a special reservation for the half-breeds. In addition to the treaties mentioned Shingabawassin signed the treaty of Sault Ste Marie, June 11, 1820. He died between 1828 and 1837, and was succeeded as chief of the Crane gens by his son Kabay Noden. Consult Schoolcraft, Pers. Mem., 1851; McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, I, 1854; Warren, Hist. Ojebways, 1885. (C. T.)

Shiniak. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on the E. shore at the head of deep-water navigation in Kuskokwim bay, Alaska, where the Moravian missionaries have a warehouse. Pop. 40 in 1880; 7 in 1890.

Shinnecock. An Algonquian tribe or band on Long id., N. Y., formerly occupying the s. coast from Shinnecock bay to Montauk pt. Many of them joined the Brotherton Indians in New York. About 150 still remain on a reservation of 750 acres, 3 m. w. of Southampton, having intermarried with negroes until their aboriginal character is almost obliterated. Nowedonah, brother of the noted Wyandanch, was once their chief, and on his death his sister, wife of Cockenoe, became his successor. In Dec. 1876, 28 Shinnecock men lost their lives in an attempt to save a ship stranded off Easthampton, since which time a number, especially the younger people, have left the reservation and become scattered. They have a Presbyterian and an Adventist church; the men gain a livelihood by employment as farm-hands, baymen, berrypickers, etc., and the women as laundresses. A few families make and sell baskets and a sort of brush made of oak splints; there is almost no agriculture. They have lost all their old customs, and but few words of their native language survive even in the memory of the oldest people, although it was in more or less general use 60 or 70 years ago. Shipapulima (Zufi: 'mist-enveloped town,' from shipu 'mist', ulin 'surrounding', imona 'sitting place of.'—Cushing). The Zufi name of the traditional place of origin as well as the final resting place of the Zufi, Keresan, and other Pueblo tribes, whence came the gods who taught them their arts, agriculture, and ceremonies. By the Zufi it is said to be a group of pueblo ruins on the Rio Mancos, a tributary of the San Juan, in s. w. Colo.; to the Rio Grande pueblos (called by them Cibola) and the Jemez (to whom it is known as Uabunatota) it is a lagoon in the same locality. See Bandelier, cited below; Cushing in 13th Rep. B. A. Shipaulovi (from shipularitu, 'mosquitoes,' because its largest clan consists of part of the people who formerly lived at Homolobi, which was abandoned on account of the mosquitoes (Voth, Trad. Hopi, 61, 1905). One of the 6 pueblos of the Hopi (q. v.), situated on the Middle mesa of Tusayan, N. E. Arizona. According to Stephen it was built by Walpi people who had intermarried with those of Mishongnovi, and according to Voth the population was considerably augmented by the Forehead clan of Homolobi after the refusal of the inhabitants of Shongopovi to receive them, and to have been further increased within historic times by the removal of people from Shongopovi on account of their fear of the Spaniards after killing the missionaries and destroying their mission in 1680. In 1782 Morfi (see Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 579, 1898) reported Shipaulovi to contain only 14 families, a reduction apparently due to a story circulated by a Shongopovi chief that the Spaniards would again make their appearance, causing many of the Shipaulovi people to move to Shongopovi. The present population is about 125. (F. W. H.)

Shoe-pack. "A moccasin having a sole turned up and sewed to the upper. Though now made of leather, the pac as used by the Indians . . . was made of hide boiled in tallow and wax, or of tawed hide subsequently stuffed with tallow and wax" (E. H. Knight, s. v. Pac, Pack, with a cross-reference to Shoe-pack, in Amer. Mechan. Dict., 1876). The Century Dictionary defines shoe-pack as a shoe made of leather without a separate sole, or in the manner of a moccasin, but of tanned leather. The word is of Lenape (Delaware) origin. In an old vocabulary of Lenape words used by the Indians of New Jersey, the word seppock is defined as 'shoes'. In the Lenape-English dictionary the name for 'shoe' is given as machtchipak (German orthography), which really means 'bad [macht-schi] shoe', and the name for 'bad shoes' as machtalipaqual, lit. 'bad-hole-shoes' (i. e. shoes bad because of holes). From this plural it appears that the Lenape name of a kind of shoe differing from the ordinary moccasin was paku, or in the Unami dialect, pathko. Shoe-pack, then, is an accommodated spelling of the abbreviation shīpak designed to give the word a semblance of meaning in English. (W. R. G.)

Shohoaigadika (Shóhoaigadika). One of the Shoshoni divisions said to live near Salmon r., a branch of Snake r. in w. Idaho.

Shonchin. See Schonchin.

Shongopovi ('place of chumoa, a variety of grass). A Hopi pueblo of the Middle mesa of Tusayan, N. E. Ariz., built probably about 1680. The earlier pueblo, which bore the same name, was situated on a ridge of foothills E. of the present town, near an ancient spring. It was one of the original villages of the Hopi, and the seat of the Franciscan mission of San Bartolomé, established about 1629, with Mishongnovi as its visita. The population of Shongopovi was about 160 in 1870, 193 in 1882, and 224 in 1891. See Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 582, 1898; Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 73, 1891. (F. W. H.)

Shopakia (Sho'pak'ia). A ruined village pertaining to the Zuñi, situated 5 m. N. of Zuñi pueblo, N. Mex.—ten Kate, Reizen in N. A., 291, 1885. Cf. Heshokta.

Shopeshno. A Chumashan village, formerly near Santa Inés mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860.

Shoremee. A Costanoan village, situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Short Bull. A Brulé Sioux, born on the Niobrara r. about 1845. He came into prominence in 1890 when chosen one of the Sioux delegation to visit Wovoka, the Indian "Messiah," at Pyramid lake, Nev. On his return he represented himself as the special vicar of Wovoka, and later, after having been imprisoned by the Federal authorities, assumed to be the "Messiah" himself. He had great vogue with the Sioux for several months during the Ghost Dance craze, but with the abatement of the excitement fell into disrepute. He resides at Pine Ridge agency, S. Dak., and affiliates with the Congregationalists. (D. R.)

Short Hair Band. An Oglala Sioux band, possibly the same as Peshla.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 629, 1853.

Shoshoko ('walkers'). A collective name of indefinite application attached to the poorer bands and individuals of the Shoshoni who did not happen to own horses, and were, temporarily at least, "walkers." As they could not hunt the buffalo and were dependent on humbler modes of livelihood, they were frequently termed "Diggers," though the latter term was really no more applicable to them than to many others who bore it. The term Shoshoko has frequently been taken to designate a definite division or tribe of the Shoshoni; in reality it is not a tribal designation at all. (H. W. H.)

Shoshonean Family. The extent of country occupied renders this one of the most important of the linguistic families of the North American Indians. The area held by Shoshonean tribes, exceeded by the territory of only two families—the Algonquian and the Athapaskan,—may thus be described: On the n. the s. w. part of Montana, the whole of Idaho s. of about lat. $45^{\circ} 30'$, with s. e. Oregon, s. of the Blue mts., w. and central Wyoming, w. and central Colorado, with a strip of n. New Mexico; e. New Mexico and the whole of n. w. Texas were Shoshonean. According to Grinnell, Blackfoot (Siksika) tradition declares that when the Blackfeet entered the plains s. of Belly r. they found that country occupied by the Snakes and the Crows. If this be true, s. w. Alberta and n. w. Montana were also Shoshonean territory. All of Utah, a section of n. Arizona, and the whole of Nevada (except a small area occupied by the Washo) were held by Shoshonean tribes. Of California a small strip in the n. e. part e. of the Sierras, and a wide section along the e. border s. of about lat. 38° , were also Shoshonean. Shoshonean bands also lived along the upper courses of some of the streams flowing into the San Joaquin. Toward the broken southern flanks of the Sierras, Shoshonean territory extended across the state in a wide band, reaching n. to Tejon cr., while along the Pacific the Shoshoni occupied the coast between lat. 33° and 34° .

From the wide extent of country thus covered, and its varied climatic and topographic features, the habits of the peoples occupying it might be expected to vary considerably, and such is indeed the case. The Hopi, in particular, differ so widely from the rest that they have little in common with them but linguistic affinity. On the n. and along the entire e. border of the territory, where lived the Shoshoni, Bannock, Ute, and Comanche divisions, their habits were essentially those of the hunting Indians generally. None of them cultivated the soil, and all derived the larger part of their subsistence from the pursuit of large game. The Comanche alone can be said to have been buffalo Indians, though buffalo were pursued more or less by all the tribes mentioned. Horses early became abundant among them. In general character they were fierce and warlike.

To the w. of the Rocky mts., in Idaho, w. Utah, Arizona, Nevada, California, and Oregon, the Shoshoneans were of a different character. The country occupied by many of them is barren in the extreme, largely destitute of big game, and of such character generally as to compel its aboriginal inhabitants to resort to humble methods of procuring subsistence. Rabbits and small game generally, fish, roots, and seeds formed the chief support of these tribes, among which were included the representatives of the family that possessed the rudest and simplest culture. It was chiefly to these tribes individually and collectively that the opprobrious name of "Diggers" was applied. These are the tribes, also, which were called by the settlers and by many writers, Paiute. Representing as a class, as they undeniably do, a culturally low type of Indian, they were by no means so low as many writers of repute have asserted. They have been represented as closely approaching the brutes in their mode of life, and, like them, of passing the winter in a semitorpid state in holes in the ground, from which they crawled forth in spring to eat grass upon hands and knees. Of all men they have been said to be the lowest. Such pictures of their condition are nonsensical. They are not true of them to-day, when, decimated in numbers and with tribal organization broken up, the remnants of many of the tribes have been forced to a precarious and parasitic mode of livelihood obtained from the whites. Still less are they true of their former condition when living under their own social organizations. The inhospitable nature of their country compelled them, it is true, to a less adventurous and humbler mode of life than their eastern brethren, who possessed a more richly endowed country. However, they made and used bows and arrows, basketry, and in parts pottery; and, more important than all, a number of the tribes, as the Paiute of Corn cr., Utah, the Gosiute of Utah, the Chemehuevi of the Rio Colorado, and some of the Nevada tribes, practised a rude agriculture.

* The Hopi of n. e. Arizona, who had made further progress toward civilization than any other of the Shoshonean tribes, had become true village Indians. Long contact and probably considerable blood-amalgamation have given them the physical type of their neighbors of the S. W., and have made them an integral part of the well-defined and highly specialized Pueblo culture. They derive their subsistence mainly from agriculture, and are skilful potters and weavers.

Over the wide expanse of territory above indicated the Shoshoneans were split into a number of major divisions, each composed of numerous bands speaking a great number of related dialects.

On linguistic grounds, as determined by Kroeber, it is found convenient to classify the Shoshonean family as follows:

I. HOPI.

II. PLATEAU SHOSHONEANS: (a) Ute-

Chemehuevi: Chemehuevi, Kawaiisu, Paiute, Panamint, Ute, and some of the Bannock; (b) Shoshoni-Comanche: Comanche, Gosiute, Shoshoni; (c) Mono-Paviotso: Mono, Paviotso, part of the Bannock, and the Shoshoneans of E. Oregon.

III. KERN RIVER SHOSHONEANS.

IV. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA SHOSHONEANS: (a) Serrano, (b) Gabrielesño, (c) Luiseno-Kawia: Agua Caliente, Juanesño, Kawia, Luiseno.

For the smaller divisions see under the several subordinate heads.

The genetic relationship of the Shoshonean languages with those of the Piman and Sonoran group, and of the Nahuatl or Aztec group in Mexico, was investigated by Buschmann in the middle of the last century. Powell has since regarded the Shoshonean group as constituting a distinct family, but others, including Brinton, Chamberlain, and Kroeber, have maintained that it is only part of a larger family, which they have designated Uto-Aztecan.

Shoshoni. The most northerly division of the Shoshonean family. They formerly occupied w. Wyoming, meeting the Ute on the s., the entire central and southern parts of Idaho, except the territory taken by the Bannock, n. e. Nevada, and a small strip of Utah w. of Great Salt lake. The Snake r. country in

URIEWISHI, A SHOSHONI

Idaho is, perhaps, to be considered their stronghold. The northern bands were found by Lewis and Clark in 1805, on the headwaters of the Missouri in w. Montana, but they had ranged previously farther e. on the plains, whence they had been driven into the Rocky mts. by the hostile Atsina and Siksika, who already possessed firearms. Nowhere had the Shoshoni established themselves on the Columbia, although they reached that river on their raiding excursions.

The origin of the term Shoshoni appears to be unknown. It apparently is not a Shoshoni word, and although the name is recognized by the Shoshoni as applying to themselves, it probably originated among some other tribe. The Cheyenne name for the Comanche, who speak the Shoshoni language, is Shishinoats-hitāneo, 'snake people'; but they have a different name for the Shoshoni. The term Snake seems to have no etymological connection with the designation Shoshoni. It has been variously and frequently applied to the northern bands of the Shoshoni, especially those of Oregon. By recent official usage the term Snake has been restricted to the Yahuskin and Walpapi of Oregon. Hoffman was of the opinion that the name Snake comes from a misconception of the sign for Snake Indian, made by a serpentine motion of the hand with the index finger extended. This he thought really has reference to the weaving of the grass lodges of the Shoshoni, a reasonable assumption, since they are known as "grass-house people," or by some similar name, among numerous tribes.

The more northerly and easterly Shoshoni were horse and buffalo Indians, and in character and in warlike prowess compared favorably with most western tribes. To the w. in western Idaho along Snake r. and to the s. in Nevada the tribes represented a lower type. Much of this country was barren in the extreme and comparatively devoid of large game, and as the nature of the country differed, so did the inhabitants. They depended for food to a large extent on fish, which was supplemented by rabbits, roots, nuts, and seeds. These were the Indians most frequently called "Diggers." They were also called Shoshokos, or "Walkers," which simply means that the Indians so called were too poor to possess horses, though the term was by no means restricted to this section, being applied to horseless Shoshoni everywhere.

None of these Shoshoni were agriculturists. In general the style of habitations corresponded to the two types of Shoshoni. In the n. and e. they lived in tipis, but in the sagebrush country to the w. they used brush shelters entirely, and Bonneville found the tribes of Snake r. wintering in such shelters without roofs, being merely half circles of brush, behind which they obtained an imperfect protection from wind and snow. There were many dialects among the Shoshoni, corresponding to the greater or less degree of isolation of the several tribes. They presented, however, no essential differences and were all mutually intelligible.

In 1909 there were in Idaho 1,766 Shoshoni and Bannock under the Ft. Hall school (of whom 474 had recently been transferred from the old Lemhi res.), and about 200 not under official supervision; in Nevada there were 243 under the Western Shoshoni school, and about 750 not under agency or school control; In Wyoming, under the Shoshoni school, there were 818, formerly known as Washaki's band, from its chief. Deducting about 500 Bannock from these figures, the total Shoshoni population approximates 3,250. The Shoshoni divisions, so far as known, were: Hohandika, Shobarboober, Shohaigadika, Shonivikidika, Tazaagadika, Towahnahooks, Tukuarika, Tussawehe, Washaki, Wihinasht, and Yahandika. Shrines. Places where sacred offerings are deposited or cult images or objects are set up. They are fixed or portable, the former often being altar shrines (see Altar), or consist of stone boxes inclosing sacred objects. The latter class includes the sacred bundles of the Pawnee, Papago, Hopi, and other tribes (see Palladium).

Shrines are common to many tribes N. of Mexico, but perhaps among none do they now enter more into the religious life of the people than among the Pueblos, particularly among the Hopi, whose shrines will here be described as typical:

Among these people any special spot consecrated to supernatural beings, where prayer offerings to them are made, is called a pahoki, or 'prayer house,' generally translated 'shrine.' There are about a hundred shrines at or near the pueblo of Walpi, half of which have special names. They are situated on the mesa, among the foothills, at springs, and near the ruins of ancestral villages. Certain of these places of offering have no special names, but are called "rain-cloud shrines," or "world-quarter shrines," because situated at the four cardinal directions from the pueblo. A Hopi shrine differs from an altar in being a place in which the offerings remain permanently, or until they or their essence are supposed to be removed by the gods.

Every great ceremony has its special shrine, but in some of them prayer offerings are made in all ceremonies. Many shrines have nothing to mark them except prayer sticks (q. v.). Common forms of shrines are circles of small stones or even a single stone, caves or clefts, a natural depression in a boulder, or any object symbolically marked. The most elaborate shrines are sealed stone inclosures, sometimes painted with symbols, and containing symbolic representations of supernatural beings, idols, water-worn stones, or fossils. Shrines may be classified either on the basis of their form and contents or on that of the supernatural beings to which they are dedicated. Of the latter, among the Hopi, there are those of the Earth and Sky gods, Kachina shrines, and shrines of numerous lesser supernatural beings.

The most elaborate Earth-goddess shrine at the East mesa of the Hopi is that of Talatumsi, situated in the foothills e. of Walpi. It is a sealed chamber in which is seated an idol of the Dawn Woman. The slab ordinarily closing the entrance is removed every November, during the New Fire ceremony, when offerings are placed near it; and every 4 years the idol is taken from the shrine and carried to the village. The shrine of Kokyanwuqti, Spider Woman, another name for the Earth goddess, is a simple stone inclosure. The shrine of Masauu, the god of the Underworld, is situated in the foothills w. of Walpi, and consists of a small pile of stones and twigs. The shrine of Tuwapontumsi, another Earth goddess, contains a petrified log surrounded by slabs of stone. There are numerous shrines of the Sky god in the vicinity of Walpi, but they are generally of very simple construction.

Sun shrines among the Hopi are simple circles of stone, with openings toward the point where the sun rises at the time of the summer solstice. A shrine at "Wala," a gap in East mesa, toward the top of the trail to Hano pueblo, containing a coiled stone, or natural cast of a shell, may be considered a Sun shrine. The Sky-serpent god, Palulukong, has several shrines, among which may be mentioned the two great springs in the foothills e. of Walpi and Hano.

The Kachina shrine is a closed receptacle constructed of slabs of stone set on edge. It is situated in the foothills w. of Walpi, and is ceremonially opened and closed every July. Individual clans have their special shrines where offerings are made to their tutelary ancestors. Rain-cloud and world-quarter shrines are of the simplest construction, commonly consisting of circles of small stones.

Shrines sometimes mark places where mythological events are said to have happened; thus the shrine of the so-called Heart-Contained-Here, in the foothills e. of Walpi, is supposed to contain the heart of a god who won a mythic foot-race. Those who aspire to speed in these races worship at this shrine.

Human or animal images of wood and stone, concretionary or botryoidal stones, carved stone slabs, and fossil shells are among the permanent objects, not offerings, found in Hopi shrines. The temporary offerings on shrines are prayer meal and pollen, sticks, clay effigies of small animals, miniature bowls and vases of water, small bows and arrows, small dolls, turquoise, shells, and other objects.

Some shrines are known by the character of their offerings; thus, a warrior's shrine contains netted shields, bows, and arrows; an eagle shrine, painted wooden imitations of eagle's eggs. Places where ceremonial paraphernalia are kept partake of the sacred nature of a shrine, and caves resorted to for prayer are considered in the same light. All springs of water are places of prayer offerings, and each has a shrine either near by or remote.

Zuñi "prayer houses" are no less numerous and instructive than those of the Hopi, and are of the same general character, although several differ in form from those above mentioned. The best known Zuñi shrine, that of Hepatina, lies near the village and is said to be consecrated to the center of the earth, in which spot it is supposed to stand. It is a tri-chambered stone inclosure with an opening to the e. surmounted by strangely formed stones. There are numerous shrines on the mesa of Taaiyalone, among which that of the Twin War Gods of the Zuñi is the most characteristic.

The most notable of the many shrines of the Rio Grande pueblos are the stone pumas of Cochiti.

Shufina (strictly Tsiphenu, 'dark-colored obsidian flakes,' from tsi, 'obsidian flakes,' phenu, 'dark'; in the Santa Clara Tewa dialect the form is Tsifeno.—J. P. Harrington). A small ancient pueblo ruin on a castle-like mesa of tufa, n. w. of Puye and separated from it by Santa Clara canyon, N. Mex. The s. face of the mesa is honeycombed with cliff-dwellings, cut in the rock. While according to Santa Clara tradition these lodges have been occupied within the historic period, they doubtless date from a time prior to the advent of the first Spaniards in the 16th century. See 7th Rep. B. A. E., xxi, 1891; Bandelier, (1) Delight Makers, 378, 1890, (2) in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 66, 1892; Hewett (1) in Am. Anthr., vi, no. 5, 1904, (2) in Bull. 32, B. A. Shulya ('beaver'). Given by Bourke (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, ii, 181, 1889) as a gens of the Mohave, q. v.

Shumasitcha (Keresan: 'the corpse on the summit'). A ruin of unknown origin on a mesa w. of Rito, near Hasatch, N. Mex. In modern times it has been temporarily occupied by the Laguna Indians, during their wars with the Navaho and Apache, as a stronghold for the protection of their flocks. So called from the fact that the corpse of a herder, who had been killed by a wild animal, was once found on the highest point of the mesa.—Pradt quoted by Hodge in Am. Anthr., iv, 346, 1891.

Shumig. A former Yurok village on the n. w. coast of California, at Patrick's Point, 5 or 6 m. n. of Trinidad. It was not inhabited in historic times, except as a camp site, but is important in mythology.

Shuminkyaiman (Shu'-míngk'ya-i'man: Shu'-me-k'u-li, the mythic man-bird of the Ka'ka or esoteric Shu'-me-kwe; in-k'ya, 'region anciently frequented by, acted in,' etc.; i'man, 'home of,' 'sitting place of'). A hill and section of country where the Shumekuli being of Zufi mythology was captured by the Shaalako; situated about 13 m. s. of Zufi pueblo, N. Mex. The whole country thereabout is covered with the stone-hut foundations attributed to the Pewikwithltchu (q. v.) (F. H. C.)

Shuminkia.—Fewkes in Jour. Am. Ethnol. and Archaeol., i, 100, 1891 (given as name of ruins).

Shumnac (Shum'-nac). A former Tigua pueblo, e. of the Rio Grande, in the vicinity of the present Mexican settlements of Chilili, Tajique, and Manzano, N. Mex.—Lummis in Scribner's Mo., 469, Apr. 1893.

Shumway Ruin. A ruined prehistoric pueblo near the town of Shumway, 40 m. s. of Holbrook, Ariz. It consists of a long house group, 2 rooms deep, and a parallel group having a wing at right angles at one end, and between these groups a plaza.—Hough in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1901, 302, pl. 22, 1903.

Shunaiki. A ruined village claimed to have been inhabited by the ancestors of the people of the present pueblo of Laguna, N. Mex.; situated about 3 m. w. of the latter. (F. W. H.)

Oú-iktoeka.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 218, 1897. Šun iktóka.—Ibid.

Shungikikarachada ('they who call themselves from the original dog'). A Winnebago gens.

Še-go'-ni-na.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 240, 1897 ('wolf': archaic name). Oúik i-ki'-ka-ra'-tea-da.—Ibid. Oúik-teaík' i-ki'-ka-ra'-tea-da.—

Ibid. Shonk-chun'-ga-dā.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 157, 1877.

Shungkahanapin ('wears a dogskin around the neck,' i. e. 'dog necklace'). A band of the Brulé Teton Sioux.

Oñkaha-nap'ia.—Dorsey (after Cleveland) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 219, 1897. Shunkaha napin.—Ibid.

Shungkayuteshni ('eat no dogs'). A band of the Miniconjou Sioux.

Oñka-yute-oni.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 220, 1897. Ho-tum'-mi'-hu-ia.—Hayden, Ethnog. and Philol. Mo. Rep. 1850, 142, 1851.

Shunkukedi (named from an island called Shān, 'old'). A Tlingit division of the Wolf phratry, living at Klawak, Alaska. The name of this clan is sometimes applied, in the form Shunkukedi-na ('Shunkukedi nation'), to the entire Wolf phratry.

Cé'ngogedf'na.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904. Schengo-kēdi.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 116, 1885.

Shup. A former Chumashan village near Carpenteria, Santa Barbara co., Cal., N. of El Rincon.

Cāp.—Henshaw, S. Barbara MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884 (c=sh).

Shupauk. A former Yaquina village on the s. side of Yaquina r., Oreg.

Cu'-dauk.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890 (c=sh).

Shuqualak. A former Choctaw town or division in Noxubee co., Miss.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 109, 1884.

Shurmuyu. The Turquoise clan of the Tigua pueblo of Isleta, N. Mex.

Shurmúyu-t'ainin.—Lummis quoted by Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 352, 1896 (t'ainin='people').

Shushuchi. A former Chumashan village between Pt Conception and Santa Barbara, Cal., in the locality now called La Fumada.

Cu'-cu-tai.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884 (c=sh).

Shustak's Village. A camping place of a Stikine chief named Shastaak (Cact'laū'k), on Etolin id., Alaska; pop. 38 in 1880.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 32, 1884.

Shuswap (strictly Sequa'pmuq). The most important Salishan tribe of British Columbia, formerly holding most of the territory between the Columbia r. watershed and Fraser r., including the basin of Thompson r. above Ashcroft, embracing Shushwap or Adams lakes, and extending n. to include Quesnel lake. They now occupy a number of small village reservations attached to the Kamloops-Okanagan and Williams Lake agencies, together with a small band, descendants of Chief Kinbasket, for about 60 years past permanently settled among the Kutenai. On the n. they border the Tsilkotin, an Athapascan tribe; on the s. and w. the kindred Okanagan, Ntlakyapamuk, and Lillooet. They have probably dwindled at least one-half since the advent of the miners in their country half a century ago, but still number more than 2,100, in the following bands: Kamloops-Okanagan Agency—Adams Lake, Ashcroft, Bonaparte, Deadman's Creek, Kamloops, Nes-kainlith or Halaut, North Thompson, Little Shushwap Lake, Spallumcheen; Williams Lake Agency—Alkali Lake, Canoe Creek, Clinton, Dog Creek, Fountain (occupied chiefly by Lillooet), High Bar, Pavilion, Soda Creek, Williams Lake; Kootenay Agency—Kinbasket.

On'-wa-la-su.—Henshaw, Buena Ventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884 (c-sh).

Shuwaletet (Cuwā'leçet). A winter village of the Katsy tribe of Cowichan at the s. end of Pitt lake, near lower Fraser r., Brit. Col.—Boas in Rep. 64th Mtg. Brit. A. A. S., 454, 1894.

Shuwimi. The Turquoise clans of the Keresan pueblos of Laguna, Sia, San Felipe, and Cochiti, N. Mex. The Turquoise clan of Laguna claims to have come originally from Sandia. The corresponding clans in Sia and San Felipe are extinct. According to Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 301, 1890) this clan, since the beginning of the 19th century, seems to represent what may be called the conservative element among the Rio Grande Keresan tribes. Cf. Tanyí. (F. W. H.)

Shuwimi-háno.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 332, 1896 (Sia form). Shuwami-hánush.—Ibid. (Cochiti form). Shuwimi-háno.—Ibid. (San Felipe form). Shu'wimi-háno.—Ibid. (Laguna form). Shyano.—Bandelier, op. cit.

Shuyakekah ('leaping place'). A former Klamath settlement near the n. end of Nilaks mts. and the shore of upper Klamath lake, Oreg. So called because here the Indians were accustomed to leap for amusement over large fallen rocks. Pop. 92 in 1877.

Linkville Indians.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. Shyik. One of the tribes participating in the Yakima treaty of June 9, 1855, and placed on the reservation of that name in Washington. It is not identifiable.

Shyika.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., 635, 1878. Shyika.—Camp Stevens treaty of 1855 in U. S. Stat. at Large, XII, 951, 1863.

Shykellimy. See Shukellamy.

Sia (from Tsia, the native name). A small Keresan tribe inhabiting a single pueblo on the n. bank of Jemez r., about 16 m. n. w. of Bernalillo, N. Mex. Castañeda (1541) mentioned one village of the tribe, but 42 years later Espejo visited their "province," which he called Punames (q. v.), describing it as containing 5 pueblos, of which Sia was the largest. Oñate (1598) mentions only Tria or Trios, which is apparently identical with Sia. Opposite the present Sia are the remains of a pueblo called Kakanatzatia, while n. of the town lies another ruined village known as Kohasaya. It is not improbable that at least one of these was among the 5 settlements alluded to by Espejo in 1583, although the Indians now claim that they occupy the same site as in the days of Coronado.

Sia engaged with the other Pueblos in the revolt against Spanish authority in 1680, making a determined stand in their village until Aug. 1689, when they were assaulted by Domingo de Cruzate, the pueblo being completely wrecked and the tribe decimated in the most bloody engagement of the Pueblo rebellion. The friendly attitude of these Indians toward the Spaniards from this time to the close of the revolt in 1696 created considerable friction between them and the people of Jemez and Cochiti. Sia was the seat of a Spanish mission from an early date, having Jemez and Santa Ana as its visitas after 1782. According to Bandelier the pueblo doubtless owes its decline since the revolt to the constant inter-killing going on for the supposed evil practice of witchcraft. Pop. 106 in 1890, 119 in 1910. As is to be expected in a tribe that has lost so much in population within the period of reliable tradition, many of the clans once represented are now extinct. Those marked with an asterisk in the following list no longer exist: Yaka (Corn), Dyami (Eagle), Kohai (Bear), Osach (Sun), Tyupi (Badger), Squ (Rattlesnake), Shutsun (Coyote), Tsits (Water), Tsi (Wild Turkey), Kuts (Antelope), Dyani (Deer), *Ishtowa (Arrow), *Mina (Salt), Showiti (Parrot), Hakan (Fire), *Hohoka (Dove), *Hapan (Oak), Hami (Tobacco), *Chanatya (Pegwood?), *Shiuwimi (Turquoise), Choshka (Roadrunner), *Shkanatulu (Lizard), Tanyi (Calabash), *Mushach (Buffalo), *Tyais (Piñon), *Sii

Siaguan. One of the tribes, probably Coahuiltecan, at San Juan Bautista and San Francisco Solano missions, Texas, at the opening of the 18th century. At San Francisco Solano this was one of the four original tribes when it was founded in Mar. 1700; the others were the Sarames (Xarames), Paiguaneas, and Panacs. They all evidently spoke the same language, and came from N. of the Rio Grande (Autos, xxviii, MS.). In 1738 Indians of this tribe were at San Bernardo mission (Portillo, Apuntes, 289). After Solano mission was transferred to San Antonio, Texas, numbers of the tribe were baptized there, and some were still living there as late as 1760 (Valero Entierros, partida 1107, MS.; see also baptismal and marriage records of Valero). It is not certain that the Siaban were distinct from this tribe, but there are indications that they were. If distinct, they were closely allied with and had essentially the same history as the Siaguan. (H. E. B.)

Siamannas ('hunters'). A name applied generally to the interior Indians by those of Washington and British Columbia. This form of the word was used for some Salish on Whatcom and Siamanna lakes, n. w. Wash. Similarly the Ntlakyapamuk were called Somena by the Cowichan, while Swádabsh, which was applied by the Nisqualli to the Shahaptian Klikitat and Yakima, is said to have the same meaning. (Gibbs in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 341, 1877). This last, however, resembles Svedebish, a name given to one of the Skagit tribes on Whidbey id., Puget sd. Cf. Samamish. (J. R. S.)

Saw-meena.—Anderson quoted by Gibbs in Hist. Mag., vii, 73, 1863. Semā'mila.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., ii, 167, 1900. Sia-man-naa.—Fitzhugh in Ind. Aff. Siansi. A tribe or subtribe, formerly of San Antonio de Valero, some of whose members lived in 1706 and 1707 at San Francisco Solano mission, near the Rio Grande, in Coahuila, Mexico.—Valero Bautismos, 1707; Entierros, 1706, 1707, MSS. cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1907.

Siapkat (Sí'ápkat). A division of the Pisuquows who probably lived originally at a place of the same name on the e. bank of the Columbia, about Bishop rock and Milk cr., below Wenatchee r., Wash., but are now in Kittitas co. They were a party to the treaty of June 9, 1855, and in 1876 were reported as one of the bands on the Yakima res.

Siasconit. One of the aboriginal divisions of Nantucket id., Mass. It probably included the site of the present Siasconset. See Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., iii, 25, 1815.

Siatlhelaak (Síatlqēlá'aq). A division of the Nuhalk, a branch of the Bellacoola of the coast of British Columbia.—Boas in 7th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 3, 1891.

Sibagna. A former Gabrieleño rancharia in Los Angeles co., Cal., on the site of San Gabriel mission (Ried, 1852, quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860). Cf. Toriscanga.

Sibagoida. A rancharia in Arizona, probably of the Maricopa, visited by Kino and Mange in 1699 (Mange cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 358, 1889). Cf. Nicoroidag.

Sibirijoa. A former settlement of the Tehueco on Rio del Fuerte, about lat. 26° 40', n. w. Sinaloa, Mexico. Hardy mentions it as a Mayo pueblo, which is improbable, although it may have contained some members of that tribe.

Sibirijoa.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., map, 1864. Sivihóa.—Hardy, Trav. in Mex., 438, 1829. Sivirijoa.—Orozco y Berra, op. cit., 332. Zibirgoa.—Kino, map (1702), in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 1726.

Sibrepue (Sibupue?). A Maricopa rancharia on the Rio Gila, Ariz., in 1744.—Sedelmair (1744) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889.

Sibubapa. A branch of the Nevome, of Sonora, Mexico, which inhabited the pueblo of Suaqui.

Sibubapas.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 351, 1864. Simupapas.—Hamy in Bull. Soc. d'Anthrop. de Paris, 786, 1883.

Sicalamous. See Shikellamy.

Sicca. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Siccameen. A Cowichan tribe on Oyster bay, s. e. Vancouver id.; pop. 40 in 1906, 30 in 1909.

Sichanetl (Sitca'nēll). A Songish division at Oak bay, s. end of Vancouver id.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 17, 1890.

Sichanghu ('burnt thighs'). A band of the Brulé Teton Sioux.

Sitca-xu.—Cleveland quoted by Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 218, 1897.

Sichomovi ('place of the wild currant-bush mound'). A pueblo of the Hopi on the East mesa of Tusayan, between Hano and Walpi, n. e. Ariz. It was built about 1750 by a colony of Badger people from Walpi, later joined by a group of Tanoan clans of the Asaphratry from the Rio Grande in New Mexico, who were invited by the Hopi to aid them in resisting the invasions of the Ute. In 1782 it contained about 15 families; the population was 91 in 1870, 120 in 1882, 107 in 1891. It now numbers about 100. See Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 62, 1891; Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 578, 1898.

Chemovi.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, i, 519, 1853. Oi-cho-mo-oi.—Ward (1861) misquoted by Donaldson, Moqui Pueblo Inds., 14, 1893. Oichomovi.—Taylor in Cal. Signals. The system of long-distance signaling in use among many tribes may be regarded as supplementary to the sign language (q. v.), and many of the signals were but adaptations of the corresponding gesture signs on a larger scale. Long-distance signals were naturally most in use and most highly systematized in the open country of the plains and the S. W., where the atmosphere is usually clear and the view unobstructed, and to a lesser degree along certain sandy beaches, as in Florida; but were rarely used, and then only in the simplest fashion, in the forest region or along such shores as that of the N. W. coast, where cloudiness was the prevailing atmospheric condition.

Signals were commonly conveyed by means of smoke, fire, or the movements of men either mounted or on foot. Their most frequent purpose was to indicate the presence of game or of danger, or to define the intentions of an approaching party. Signals by means of fires built at convenient observation points were most frequent at night and along the coast, and were usually simple alarm fires, serving rather to announce the event than to disclose its nature. The fire might mean the stranding of a whale or the approach of a boatload of strangers, and the watchers in the distant village at once prepared for either emergency, according to their expectation. If they were on the lookout for food or plunder they came prepared; if they dreaded an enemy they fled until they thought the danger had passed. The narratives of the early explorers along the southern coasts make frequent allusions to such signal fires. Methods of setting fire to an enemy's camp or fortified village by means of lighted combustibles attached to arrows were in general use down to a recent period, but the statement by one author that the Sioux had an elaborate system of signaling at night by means of fiery arrows requires confirmation.

Smoke signals by day were used over a wide area of the western country, and were reduced to a regular system by means of which many different details of information could be conveyed across miles of distance. The fire was built on some commanding elevation, the combustible used being damp grass, weeds, cedar tops, or some similar material which would burn slowly and throw out a dense smoke. The fire, after having been lighted, was first allowed to burn for some time without hindrance until it was evident or probable that it had attracted the attention of those at a distance for whom it was intended. The signaler then proceeded with the message by throwing his blanket over the smoldering pile so as to confine the smoke, and then withdrawing it, allowing a single balloon-like puff of smoke to ascend toward the sky. This was repeated again and again until by the number, length, or continued succession of the smoke puffs the watchers in camp knew whether buffalo or an approaching enemy had been discovered, whether they must flee for safety, or hurry with all speed to the attack or rescue. The signal was the more surely noted by reason of the fact that the Indians were almost constantly on the watch and that certain commanding lookout points in the neighborhood of every regular camping place were recognized as regular signal stations. Returning war parties among the Pima and some other tribes of that region were accustomed to give advance notice of the number of scalps taken by means of a corresponding number of fires built within view of the home camp. Among the Omaha the returning successful war party sent up smoke signals when near the home camp, while on coming in sight of their friends the number of warriors lost was indicated by having the same number of men turn successively to one side and drop to the ground (La Flesche). The Apache sent up fire signals by firing the resinous spines on the tall trunks of the giant saguaro cactus (Cereus giganteus). The timber tribes of the E., on the contrary, made similar announcement by means of the long-drawn scalp halloo.

Motion signals were made either on horse or foot, and frequently with the aid of the blanket which the Indian warrior almost always wore about his shoulders or twisted around his waist. In many cases, as has been said, they were simply adaptations from the ordinary sign language, and were frequently extremely picturesque in execution. The ordinary signal of "discovery" was made by riding in a circle, not because the circle in itself indicated anything in this connection, but because such a movement was most sure to be distinguishable from any direction. When it was seen from the bustle in camp to have attracted attention, it was followed by the specific signal for "buffalo" or "enemy," the two most constant ideas in the mind of the western nomad. The buffalo sign might be made to do duty for any other large game or even in late times for a herd of range cattle, while the absence of either sign after the discovery signal indicated the proximity of a friendly party. The "buffalo" signal was made by holding the open blanket at the two corners with the arms outstretched above the head and gracefully bringing it down toward the ground. The "enemy" signal was made by confused and rapid riding back and forth after the first discovery signal. It was also made by waving the outstretched blanket several times rapidly above the head. Among the Omaha and some other tribes the "discovery" signal was made by riding from side to side, or by running in the same way, if on foot, the motion being known by terms signifying approximately "showing" or "zig-zagging." The false or dishonest making of this signal was severely punished (La Flesche). The "alarm" signal was made by throwing the blanket into the air several times in quick succession. The signal for "coast clear" was given by gently waving the open blanket from side to side in front of the body. Returning war parties or parties of scouts often with robe or blanket signaled success or failure, and in the latter case the number of men that the party had lost. Other signals, more or less easily understood, indicated "come," "halt," "friend," "defiance," etc. On those accidental occasions where the discoverer was without either horse or blanket, he might give the alarm from a distance by throwing up handfuls of dust. The Sioux, and perhaps other northern plains tribes, in later times had a system of heliograph signals by means of mirrors.

The drum signal, for calling the people together on ceremonial occasions and for marking the changes in the performance, was probably universal. Signal calls, as the "journey halloo" of an expedition on starting out, the "scalp halloo," the "death halloo," etc., were in general use among the Eastern tribes. On Kodiak and the Aleutian ids. of Alaska, according to Miss A. C. Fletcher, strangers halted at a recognized station to signal to the distant village and then sat down to await the arrival of the receiving party, occupying themselves in the meantime in fashioning stone lamps from material always kept on deposit at such places. Farther s. along the same coast, as early as 1787, explorers noted the peace signal made from an approaching canoe by blowing into the air the white down feathers of the eagle, or displaying a tuft of white feathers from a pole set up at the head of the canoe. The various social signals, used by children at play, by lovers, and by others in the home camps, were too diverse for description.

Closely akin to signals were the various trail marks used to indicate the passing of a traveler or party, the occurrence of some notable incident, etc. These varied from the simple bending of a twig, blazing of a tree, or piling of stones, to the elaborate pictograph set in some conspicuous place, or the symbolic declaration of war among the Eastern tribes, particularly in the Gulf states, by setting up red-painted arrows along the trail near the enemy's village, along with the totemic symbol of the attacking tribe, or leaving in plain view a red-painted tomahawk with a scalp attached. (J. M.)

Sign language. A system of gestures in use by the Indians of the plains for intercommunication among tribes speaking different languages. Traces of such a system have been found among the former tribes of E. United States, in the Canadian northwest, and in Mexico, but as commonly known the sign language belongs to the tribes between the Missouri and the Rocky mts. and from Fraser r., Brit. Col., s. to the Rio Grande. It seems never to have extended w. of the mountains, excepting among the Nez Percés and other tribes accustomed to make periodic hunting excursions into the plains, nor to have attained any high development among the sedentary tribes in the eastern timber region, being superseded in these sections by some mother dialect or trade jargon. In the great treeless area of the plains, stretching nearly 2,000 m. from N. to S. and occupied by tribes of many different stocks, all constantly shifting about in pursuit of the buffalo herds and thus continually brought into friendly meeting or hostile collision, the necessities of nomadic life resulted in the evolution of a highly developed system of gesture communication which, for all ordinary purposes, hardly fell short of the perfection of a spoken language.

In its evolution the sign language appears to have followed the same lines along which, according to the theory of most philologists, human speech developed, viz, a gradual progress from the representative to the conventional, from the picture to the arbitrary symbol, the sign language, however, being still chiefly in the representative or pantomimic stage. It may, in fact, be described as a motional equivalent of the Indian pictograph, the conventional sign being usually a close reference to the predominant characteristic of the object in shape, habit, or purpose. The signs are made almost entirely with the hands, either one or both. Minor differences exist, like dialects in spoken languages, the differences being naturally greatest at the two extremes of the sign-language area, but even with these slight dissimilarities a Sioux or a Blackfoot from the upper Missouri has no difficulty in communicating with a visiting Kiowa or Comanche from the Texas border on any subject from the negotiating of a treaty to the recital of a mythic story or the telling of a hunting incident. The claim of any particular tribe to having invented the system may be set down as mere boasting, but it is universally admitted that the Crows, Cheyenne, and Kiowa are most expert in its use; and the tribes E. and W. of the central area, viz, the Omaha, Kansa, Osage, and others near the Missouri, and the Ute and Shoshoni in the mountains, know less of it. In fluent grace of movement a conversation in the sign language between a Cheyenne and a Kiowa is the very poetry of motion.

As has been stated, the signs in every case are founded on some tangible or symbolic characteristic, although by abbreviation or "wearing down," as in a spoken language, the resemblance has frequently been obscured and conventionalized. Thus the sign for man is made by throwing out the hand, back outward, with index finger extended upward, apparently having reference to an old root word in many Indian languages which defines man as the erect animal. Woman is indicated by a sweeping downward movement of the hand at the side of the head, with fingers extended toward the hair to denote long flowing hair or the combing of flowing locks. A white man is distinguished as the hat wearer, either by drawing the index finger across the forehead or by clapping the forehead with outstretched thumb and index finger. For Indian the speaker rubs the back of his left hand, or, perhaps, his cheek, with the palm of the right to indicate a person whose skin is of the same color. The sign having obtained this conventional meaning, it may be used equally by a white man to convey the same idea. Each tribe is designated by a special sign combination, usually the equivalent of the common name in the various spoken languages. Thus for Blackfoot the speaker touches his moccasin and then rubs his fingers upon something black. For Ute he makes the sign for black man. For Pawnee, the "Wolf people" of the Plains tribes, he throws up the right hand, with two fingers apart and pointing upward and forward, at the side of his head, to indicate erect ears of a wolf, following this with the sign for man, as already explained. Another suggested interpretation is "Horn people" from a peculiar scalp-lock formerly worn by the Pawnee. A tipi is shown by bringing both index fingers together like an inverted V (\wedge), to indicate the conical shape and the crossing of the poles. An ordinary house would be distinguished by adding the sign for white man. The buffalo, and in later days a cow, is indicated by crooking the index finger at the side of the head to resemble a horn. A dog is indicated by drawing the hand, with first and second fingers spread apart, across in front of the body, typifying the old time travois dragged by the animal when used as a beast of burden.

Eating and drinking are indicated by signs easily intelligible. Sleeping is indicated by inclining the head to one side, with the open palm held just below, typifying the recumbent attitude of repose. As days, or rather nights, are counted by "sleeps," the same sign may mean a day when used in connection with enumeration, indicated by the motion of counting upon the fingers. In the same way cold is indicated by a shivering movement of the clenched hands in front of the body, and as Indians count years by winters or "cold" seasons, it signifies also a year in another context. The hand upright and turned upon the wrist, with fingers apart and extended, indicates the question sign, and a somewhat similar but slower gesture means vacillation, i. e. maybe.

Reduced to action, the question, "How old are you?" becomes (1) point finger at subject=you; (2) cold sign=winter, year; (3) counting sign=number; (4) question sign=how many? An expert can go through the whole movement in about the time required to put the spoken question, with the advantage that he can be understood by an Indian of any language from Canada to Texas.

Some signs are beautifully symbolic. Thus, fatigue is shown by a downward and outward sweep of the two hands in front of the body, index fingers extended, giving a gesture-picture of utter collapse. Bad is indicated by a motion of throwing away; truth by signs for straight talk, and falsehood by the talk sign, with another for different directions, i. e. "talking two ways."

Besides the hand gestures, there is also a signal system for communicating on war or hunting expeditions by means of smoke, waving of a blanket, riding in a circle, etc., to indicate discovering enemies, buffalo, advance, retreat, etc. See Signals.

The best practical treatise on the subject is Capt. W. P. Clark's Indian Sign Language, 1885. A philosophic and comparative presentation is given by Col. Garrick Mallery in 1st Rep. B. A. E., 1881. (J. M.)

Siguniktawak ('inhabitants of C. Chignecto,' from sigunikt, 'foot cloth,' the native name of the cape). A Micmac band on a reservation near Parrsborough, Cumberland co., Nova Scotia. The number connected with the agency was 95 in 1909.

Siguniktawak. A Micmac band in Pictou co., Nova Scotia (Rand, Micmac Reading Bk., 81, 1875). The Micmac now in this county occupy the Fisher's Grant and Indian Island reserves and numbered 174 in 1909.

Sigwaahsohgwi. See Sequidongque.

Sihasapa ('black feet', so called because they wore black moccasins). A small division of the Teton Sioux. The name, like the names of some other Teton tribes, does not appear to have come into notice until a recent date, no mention being made of it by Lewis and Clark, Long, or earlier authorities. Catlin in his Letters and Notes, written during his stay among the northwestern Indians (1832-39), mentions the Blackfoot Sioux. In a note to De Smet's Letters (1843) they were estimated to number 1,500. Culbertson (Smithson. Rep. 1850, 141, 1851) estimated the tribe at 450 lodges, an exaggeration, and mentions five bands or subtribes, but does not locate them. It was not until Gen. Warren and Dr.

PEZHI, "GRASS," A SIHASAPA OR BLACKFOOT SIOUX

Hayden visited their country that definite information in regard to them was obtained. The former (1856) makes the following brief notes: "Sihaspas Blackfeet. Haunts and homes same as the Unkpapas; number, 165 lodges. These two bands have very little respect for the power of the whites. . . . Many of the depredations along the Platte are committed by the Unkpapas and Sihaspas, whose homes are farther from it than those of any other of the Tetonwans." Hayden (1862) says that they, the Hunkpapa and Sans Arcs, "occupy nearly the same district, and are so often encamped near each other, and otherwise so connected in their operations, as scarcely to admit of being treated of separately. That part of the country under their control lies along the Moreau, Cannonball, Heart, and Grand rs., seldom extending very high up on Grand r., but of late years reaching to the Little Missouri [in North Dakota]. Although the bands just mentioned are often stationed near each other, they are sometimes found several days' journey apart, and each is headed by its own chief." His estimate is 220 lodges. Subsequently the Sihaspas were gathered partly at Cheyenne River res., S. Dak., and partly at Standing Rock res., N. Dak. The number on the former in 1878 was 224, and on the latter 590, a total of 814. They are no longer separately reported. J. O. Dorsey mentions the following bands: 1, Sihasapakhcha; 2, Kanghishunpegnaka; 3, Glaglahecha; 4, Wazhazhe; 5, Hohe; 6, Wamnughaoín. Swift (1884) gives the same divisions, except that he omits Glaglahecha and includes Tizaptan. The first and third were given in a list of bands by Culbertson (1850), who enumerates also the Cuts, Those That Camp Next To The Last, Tashunkeota, and Devil's Medicine-man Band.

Sijame. A tribe, either Tonkawan or Coahuiltecan, represented in considerable numbers between 1719 and 1763 at San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas. It was mentioned as early as 1716 by Espinosa, who encountered some of its members in a rancheria in central Texas with Pamaya, Payaya, Xarame, and others (Diario, MS. in Archivo Gen., Prov. Intern., CLXXXI). In 1727 Rivera listed them as a tribe of Coahuila, which, if he were correct, would place them w. of San Antonio (Diario, leg. 2763, 1736). They are also given by Orozco y Berra as a Coahuila tribe (Geog., 306, 1864), but other evidence seems rather to place them farther E.

A child of gentile Sijames was baptized at San Antonio de Valero as early as 1719, the second year of the mission's existence (Valero Bautismos, partida 47, 1719). Baptisms of members of the tribe are recorded there as late as 1761, and burials as late as 1763 (ibid., partida 1469; Entierros, partida 1212). Before 1740 the number of the tribe coming to the mission was small, but in that year they entered in considerable numbers, apparently coming with the Sana, Mayeye, Emet, Tuu, Ervipiame, Caguas (Cavas), Zorquan, and others. This close association with the tribes named is an indication of a central Texas habitat and of Tonkawan affiliation. On this point see Sana. A considerable list of personal names of members of the above tribes has been preserved and will probably make it possible to settle definitely their linguistic affinity. Names of some members of the Sijame tribe, represented by Spanish orthography, were as follows: Pererqueguita, Amatmesat, Teamo, Cinmaiaia, Apenujume, Pautenejera, Tecumerea, Ostiaia, Pozoa, Maiaya, Comecaguagua, and Ameterajera. All but the last two names were of men or boys, these two being of women. (H. E. B.)

Siksatok. A former Aleut village on Agattu id., Alaska, one of the Near id. groups of the Aleutians, now uninhabited.

Siksika ('black feet', from siksinam 'black', ka the root of oykatsi 'foot'). The origin of the name is disputed, but it is commonly believed to have reference to the discoloring of their moccasins by the ashes of the prairie fires; it may possibly have reference to black-painted moccasins, such as were worn by the Pawnee, Sihasapa, and other tribes). An important Algonquian confederacy of the northern plains, consisting of three subtribes, the Siksika proper or Blackfeet, the Kainah or Bloods, and the Piegan, the whole body being popularly known as Blackfeet. In close alliance with these are the Atsina and the Sarsi.

Within the recent historic period, until gathered upon reservations, the Blackfeet held most of the immense territory stretching almost from North Saskatchewan r., Canada, to the southern head-streams of the Missouri in Montana, and from about lon. 105° to the base of the Rocky mts. A century earlier, or about 1790, they were found by Mackenzie occupying the upper and middle South Saskatchewan, with the Atsina on the lower course of the same stream, both tribes being apparently in slow migration toward the n. w. (Mackenzie, Voy., lxx-lxxi, 1801). This would make them the vanguard of the Algonquian movement from the Red r. country. With the exception of a temporary occupancy by invading Cree, this extreme northern region has always, within the historic period, been held by Athapascan tribes. The tribe is now settled on three reservations in Alberta, Canada, and one in n. w. Montana, about half being on each side of the international boundary.

So far as history and tradition go, the Blackfeet have been roving buffalo hunters, dwelling in tipis and shifting periodically from place to place, without permanent habitations, without the pottery art or canoes, and without agriculture excepting for the sowing and gathering of a species of native tobacco. They also gathered the camas root in the foothills. Their traditions go back to a time when they had no horses and hunted their game on foot; but as early as Mackenzie's time, before 1800, they already had many horses, taken from tribes farther to the s., and later they became noted for their great horse herds. It is entirely probable that their spread over the plains region was due largely to the acquisition of the horse, and, about the same time, of the gun. They were a restless, aggressive, and predatory people, and, excepting for the Atsina and Sarsi, who lived under their protection, were constantly at war with all their neighbors, the Cree, Assiniboin, Sioux, Crows, Flatheads, and Kutenai. While never regularly at war with the United States, their general attitude toward Americans in the early days was one of hostility, while maintaining a doubtful friendship with the Hudson's Bay Co.

Their culture was that of the Plains tribes generally, although there is evidence of an earlier culture, approximately that of the Eastern timber tribes. The 3 main divisions seem to have been independent of each other, each having its own Sundance, council, and elective head-chief, although the Blackfeet proper appear to have been the original nucleus. Each of the 3 was subdivided into a number of bands, of which Grinnell enumerates 45 in all. It has been said that these bands were gentes, but if so, their gentile character is no longer apparent. There is also a military and fraternal organization, similar to that existing in other Plains tribes, known among the Blackfeet as the Ikunuhkahtsi, or 'All Comrades,' and consisting formerly, according to Grinnell, of at least 12 orders or societies, most of which are now extinct. They have a great number of dances—religious, war, and social—besides secret societies for various purposes, together with many "sacred bundles," around each of which centers a ritual. Practically every adult has also his personal "medicine." Both sexes may be members of some societies. Their principal deities are the Sun, and a supernatural being known as Napi, 'Old Man,' who may be an incarnation of the same idea. The dead are usually deposited in trees or sometimes laid away in tipis erected for the purpose on prominent hills.

As usual, many of the early estimates of Blackfoot population are plainly unreliable. The best appears to be that of Mackenzie, who estimated them about 1790 at 2,250 to 2,500 warriors, or perhaps 9,000 souls. In 1780-81, in 1837-38, in 1845, in 1857-58, and in 1869 they suffered great losses by smallpox. In 1864 they were reduced by measles, and in 1883-84 some 600 of those in Montana died of sheer starvation in consequence of the sudden extinction of the buffalo coincident with a reduction of rations. The official Indian report for 1858 gave them 7,300 souls, but another estimate, quoted by Hayden as having been made "under the most favorable circumstances" about the same time, gives them 2,400 warriors and 6,720 souls. In 1909 they were officially reported to number in all 4,635, viz: Blackfoot agency, Alberta, 795; Blood agency, Alberta, 1,174; Piegan agency, Alberta, 471; Blackfoot agency (Piegan), Montana, 2,195.

Siksika. A tribe of the Siksika confederacy (q. v.). They now live on a reservation in Alberta, Canada, on upper Bow r., and are officially known as the Running Rabbit and Yellow Horse bands. They were divided into the following subtribes or bands: Aisikstukiks, Apikaiyiks, Emi-tahpahksaiyiks, Motahtosiks, Puhksinah-mahyiks, Saiyiks, Siksiniokaks, Tsinihtsis-tsoyiks. Pop. 942 in 1902, 795 in 1909.

Siksiniokaks ('black elks'). A subtribe or band of the Kainah division of the Siksika or Blackfeet, and also of the Siksika proper.

Silongkoyo. A former Maidu village at Quincy, Plumas co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., XVII, map, 1905.

Silpoponemew. A former Chumashan village at San Antonio, about 4 m. from Santa Barbara mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860.

Silver. At the time of the discovery silver had not come into general use among the aborigines N. of Mexico. The native metal is found sparingly in many localities, notably in small bits in direct association with native copper in the L. Superior region, from which source a limited supply probably was obtained. Finds of objects of silver in the older mounds are rare. An interesting occurrence of silver in a mound in Pickaway co., Ohio, is mentioned by Fowke. In a stone box, 3½ in. long and 3 in. deep, made of the halves of two concretions fitted together, were five nuggets of silver about the size of small walnuts. Three were coated with black paint and 2 with reddish ocher. Prof. Putnam describes a number of objects of copper from the Turner mound, in Hamilton co., Ohio, plated with thin sheets of silver; and Dr Thomas illustrates 2 small, neatly cut objects of sheet silver which were found wrapped about a bit of cane along with a burial in a mound in Warren co., Pa. An interesting find of silver-plated objects in connection with a burial is described by Dr S. P. Hildreth and quoted by Squier. These consisted of large circular bosses composed of copper overlaid with a thick plating of silver on a ribbed plate of silver 2 in. in breadth and 6 in length. Hildreth regarded these as probably part of a sword scabbard, but it is more likely that they are aboriginal ornaments. A number of disks and tablets of thin sheet silver and some other objects have been found in Florida, but it is believed that in the main they are recent, the metal having been derived from foreign sources—either from Europe direct or from vessels wrecked on the coast of Florida on the homeward voyage from Mexico. It is observed that some of these objects are alloyed with copper and gold in different proportions, and this is confirmative of western origin, alloys of gold, silver, and copper being common in middle America.

FROM ARKANSAS MOUND

Some of the native tribes, under the influence of the whites, have turned their attention to silver working, and the Navaho and some of the Pueblos in Arizona and New Mexico, employing methods learned from the Mexicans, make many objects of use and ornament. The Iroquois, and the Haida and other N. W. coast tribes are also skilful metal workers, producing many tasteful ornaments, such as bracelets and pendants ornamented with engravings of mythical subjects. Silver was early introduced by colonial traders, and objects of this metal of European make are frequently found in the mounds, as well as on village sites in many sections of the country. These include necklaces, bracelets, brooches, lockets, rings, and especially crosses. See Metal-work, Ornament.

Simaomo. A central Texas tribe or group, apparently Tonkawan, frequently mentioned by the Spaniards under the name of Cantona, or some variation of this name, in the later 17th and early 18th century records, but suddenly disappearing thereafter. It is quite probably a tribe known in later times by some other name, and one document seems to connect it with the Yojuane (q. v.). They are apparently distinct from the Indians referred to by the French writers as Canohatinno (see Kanohatino), for the latter were hostile to the Hasinai (Caddo), which evidently was not the case with the Simaomo.

The Cantona were definitely mentioned by Massanet in 1691 as one of the tribes living E. of Arroyo del Cibolo and speaking a language different from that of the Coahuiltecan tribes to the W. of that stream (Diario, MS. in Mem. de Nueva España, XXVII, 98). Tribes mentioned in the same connection were the Sanas, Emet, and Cavas. In the same year Jesus María, missionary among the Nabadache (q. v.), included the tribe, which he called the Cantauhaona, in his list of Texas, or "allies," living s. w. of his mission on the Neches (Relación, MS.). In 1692 it was proposed by Don Gregorio de Salinas, who had crossed Texas four times, that the missionaries among the Nabedache should retire to the Colorado and induce that tribe to settle between the Colorado and the Brazos "with the Cantona nation, which, for another name, is called Simaomo. They are a large nation and are friends of these [Nabedache] . . . They are together most of the year hunting buffalo, for which this is the center" (Salinas, Compendio de puntos, etc., 1692, MS.). In 1692 the Cantona were met on the Colorado by Terán (autos of the Terán Expedition, MS.). In 1693 Joseph Urrutia, later captain at San Antonio, was left disabled at the Colorado r. when the Spaniards retired. Being found by a body of "Cantujaunás, Toos, and Yemes [Emets]," he was rescued by the great chief Cantujauná, and taken to his rancheria, where he lived 7 years, becoming head-chief in their wars with the Apache, against whom, he claimed, he sometimes led 10,000 or 12,000 men (Urrutia to the Viceroy, July 4, 1733, MS.). Information recorded in 1709 connects the names Cantona and Simaomo with Yojuane. In April of that year Fr. San Buenaventura y Olivares and Fr. Isidro Felix de Espinosa were visited at the Colorado by a band of Indians composed mainly of "Yojuan," with some "Simomo" and "Tusolivi." Among them was the old Cantona chief known to the Spaniards since 1691, whom Espinosa now calls "the chief Canttona" and "the chief of the Yojuanes, called Canttona" (Diary, 1709, MS.). From this it would seem that the tribe formerly known as Cantona had been so called from the name of the principal chief, which was a common practice with the Spaniards. On the other hand, one can not fail to note the resemblance between the last part of the name Cantujauná and the tribal name Yojuan. The missionaries made a visit to the rancheria of these tribes, which was near by, and estimated its population at 2,500. They were on friendly terms with the Hasinai, to whom they agreed to carry a message (Espinosa, op. cit.). In 1716 Espinosa met Cantona Indians in a rancheria near the Brazos, with members of numerous other tribes (Diary, entries for June 10-13). Except for the baptism of one Cantona Indian in 1725 at the Ervipiame mission, this is the last we hear of the tribe under that name, though their old associates, the Emet, Too, Sanos, Cavas, and others are known much later. The passage in the diary of Espinosa, cited above, and the statement of Urrutia, cause one to wonder if the Cantona were not a branch of the Yojuane more frequently heard of farther n. but who entered the San Xavier missions in this region in 1749. (H. E. B.)

Sinaloa (said to be contracted from sina, a species of pitahaya; lobala, 'a round object': hence 'round pitahaya'). A division of the Cahita group of the Piman family, inhabiting principally n. Sinaloa and s. e. Sonora, Mexico, on the western slopes of the sierras, about the headwaters of Rio del Fuerte. There is considerable confusion among early writers respecting the application of the name. Hervas (Cat. Leng., i, 322, 1800) identifies the Cinoloe people with the Yaqui, although Ribas (Hist. Trium., 142, 1645) had considered them a distinct tribe living on the headwaters of Rio del Fuerte. The name has also been applied synonymously with Cahita. The Sinaloa were described in 1645 as being able to muster 1,000 warriors. Their idiom was closely related to, if not identical with, that of the Tehueco. They were probably absorbed by stronger allied tribes. (F. W. H.)

Sinarghutlitun (Si'-na-rxút-li'-tún, 'cata-ract village'). A band or village of the Chastacosta on the n. side of Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 234, 1890.

Sindas-kun (Si'ndas kun, 'village on a point always smelling'). A Haida town in the Ninstints country belonging to the Kaidju-kegawai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Sindatahls (Si'ndat!als, 'gambling place'). A Haida town of a branch of the Kuna-lanas family called Dju-shade, formerly near Tsoo-skahli, an inner expansion of Masset inlet, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Sinegainsee (Sine-gain'-see, 'creeping thing', i. e. 'snake'). A clan of the Hurons.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 153, 1877.

Sinew. The popular term for the tendinous animal fiber used by the Indians chiefly as thread for sewing purposes. The fiber thus used is not, as commonly supposed, the tendon from the legs, but the large tendon, about 2 feet in length, lying along each side of the backbone of the buffalo, cow, deer, or other animal, just back of the neck joint. The tendons were stripped out and dried, and when thread was needed were hammered to soften them and then shredded with an awl or a piece of flint. Sometimes the tendon was stripped of long fibers as needed, and often the tendons were shredded fine and twisted in the same way as agave fiber. The Eskimo had a twister like that used by the Pima, and commonly plaited the fibers into fine sennit; but most other tribes simply twisted it with the hands or on the thigh. Practically all the sewing of skins for costume, bags, pouches, tents, boats, etc., was done with sinew, as was embroidery with beads and quills. For binding together parts of woodwork sinew was even more valuable than rawhide. One of the more remarkable of its many uses was as a spring in an Alaskan Eskimo fox trap of Siberian origin. The elasticity of sinew was known to many tribes, who applied this material to the backs of bows, either as a series of cords lashed on and twisted by means of ivory keys (Eskimo), or by fastening a layer of shredded sinew to the back of the bow with glue, a method employed by the Pacific Coast tribes and some others. The enormously strong sinew bowstring enabled the Indians to employ powerful bows. The Klamath recurving bow, for instance, will snap any cord of vegetal material as if it were pack thread.

Another important use of sinew was in feathering and pointing arrows. Some tribes set arrowheads in such a way that the sinew binding would soften in the wound so that the head would remain when the shaft was withdrawn. By moistening the end of the sinew in binding the feather to the shaft, and in similar light work, it was made to hold fast without the use of glue. Fishing lines and cords for harpoons, etc., were frequently of sinew; the rope over which hides were worked in tanning was ordinarily made of this material, and arrowpoints were once made entirely of buffalo sinew by the Hidatsa. At present the pair from a single cow is commonly rated among the Plains tribes at 50 cents. (W. H.)

Sinicon. A former Chumashan village near Santa Barbara, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 24, 1863.

Sinicu. A tribe or subtribe represented at San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas, between 1728 and 1739. It may be identical with the Secmócó tribe (q. v.), members of which were there at the same time. Cf. Snerca. (H. R. E.)

Sinkers. Primitive fishermen everywhere weight their lines and nets with stones. There are usually pebbles or other suitable bits of stone, grooved or notched for attachment by means of cords. Those now in use by the Indian tribes, as well as by the whites, correspond with specimens found in large numbers along the banks of streams and the shores of lakes and other large bodies of water. Larger specimens of the same general shape become anchors (q. v.) on occasion, and the better finished forms pass by imperceptible gradations into the very large group of objects classed as plummet (q. v.), and, in another direction, into the stone club-heads of the Plains tribes (see Weapons). Adair states that the Southern Indians, having placed a trap in the bed of the stream, drove the fish toward it by means of a rope made of long grape vines to which were attached stones at proper distances, men placed on opposite sides of the stream dragging the weighted rope along the bottom. The extent to which nets (q. v.) were used by the Indians of the Middle Atlantic states is not known; but the impressions of nets of varying degrees of fineness on pottery show at least that nets were in common use.

Sinklesia (Navaho name). An ancient pueblo ruin situated on the highest point of a peninsula-like mesa jutting into Chaco canyon from the s., about $\frac{1}{2}$ m. s. of Pueblo Bonito, N. W. N. Mex. It is built of dull-brown sandstone, rectangular in form but very irregular, a semicircular tier of rooms on the s. inclosing a large court. The dimensions of the structure are 135 ft n. and w. by 183 ft n. and s. The n. wing is 50 by 75 ft, the w. 30 by 58 ft. A wing 30 ft wide extends 40 ft to the s. The semicircular tier of rooms was 256 ft long, 9 ft wide, and 2 stories high; 72 ft of this tier is still (1902) standing about 12 ft high. The walls throughout vary from 20 to 30 in. thick. The rooms are long and narrow, $5\frac{1}{2}$ by $21\frac{1}{2}$ ft being a common size. There are 5 circular kivas in the building, varying from 6 to 25 ft in diameter. The masonry is of alternating bands of fine and coarse stone and dressed blocks chinked with fine tablets, the arrangement being very irregular. Portions of the third story remain standing. The original height was probably 4 stories. (E. L. H.)

Sinkyons. An Athapascan group formerly living on the lower part of the South fork of Eel r., Humboldt co., Cal., having settlements on Bull and Salmon crs. They also held the country down to the coast at Shelter cove and s. to Ucal. This section has been popularly known as the Ucal (a Pomo term), that on Bull cr. and South fork as the Lolanko (from the name of a locality). They lived for a time on Smith River res., afterward being transferred to Hoopa res. on Trinity r., from which place a few survivors returned in the early seventies and are now living near their old homes. They lived in conical houses of bark, dressed much as the tribes about them, and made baskets by twining. They burned their dead. They differed but little from the Wailaki in language. (F. E. G.)

Sinnonquiesse ('Very long wampum string.'—Hewitt). A Mohawk chief, the speaker at Albany in 1691, 1698, 1700, and 1701, signing the Beaver land treaty in the latter year. He was examined about Dellin in 1699, and was at Albany in 1702. Possibly Tananguriss at the Albany council of Sept. 4, 1691, is the same person. The Indian Sinonneeque-rison, who signed a deed in 1714, seems a later chief. In 1711 M. de Longuenil was called Sinonquirese. See N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., III, 805, 807, 1853; IV, 237, 540, 910, 1854. (W. M. B.)

Sinopah (Sin'-o-pah, 'kit-foxes', 'Pie-gans'). A society of the Ikunuhkatsi, or All Comrades, in the Piegan tribe of the Siksika. It is now obsolete among the Piegan, but still existed with the Kainah in 1892.—Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 221, 1892.

Sinoquipe ('birthplace of warriors'). A pueblo of the Opata and the seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1646; situated in lat. 30° 10', lon. 110°, on the upper Rio Sonora below Arispe, Sonora, Mexico. Pop. 367 in 1678, 91 in 1730.

Siorartijung. A spring settlement of Padlimiut Eskimo on the coast s. of Home bay, Baffin land, Canada.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Siouan Family. The most populous linguistic family N. of Mexico, next to the Algonquian. The name is taken from a term applied to the largest and best known tribal group or confederacy belonging to the family, the Sioux or Dakota, which, in turn, is an abbreviation of Nadowessieux, a French corruption of Nadoue-is-iu, the appellation given them by the Chippewa. It signifies 'snake,' 'adder,' and, by metaphor, 'enemy.' See Dakota.

Before changes of domicile took place among them, resulting from contact with whites, the principal body extended from the W. bank of the Mississippi northward from the Arkansas nearly to the Rocky mts., except for certain sections held by the Pawnee, Arikara, Cheyenne, Arapaho, Blackfeet, Comanche, and Kiowa. The Dakota proper also occupied territory on the E. side of the river, from the mouth of the Wisconsin to Mille Lacs, and the Winnebago were about the lake of that name and the head of Green bay. Northward Siouan tribes extended some distance into Canada, in the direction of L. Winnipeg. A second group of Siouan tribes, embracing the Catawba, Sara or Cheraw, Saponi, Tutelo, and several others, occupied the central part of North Carolina and South Carolina and the piedmont region of Virginia (see Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1894), while the Biloxi dwelt in Mississippi along the Gulf coast, and the Ofo on Yazoo r. in the same state.

According to tradition the Mandan and Hidatsa reached the upper Missouri from the N. E., and, impelled by the Dakota, moved slowly upstream to their present location. Some time after the Hidatsa reached the Missouri internal troubles broke out, and part, now called the Crows, separated and moved westward to the neighborhood of Yellowstone r. The Dakota formerly inhabited the forest region of S. Minnesota, and do not seem to have gone out upon the plains until hard pressed by the Chippewa, who had been supplied with guns by the French. According to all the evidence available, traditional and otherwise, the so-called Chiwere tribes—Iowa, Oto, and Missouri—separated from the Winnebago or else moved westward to the Missouri from the same region. The five remaining tribes of this group—Omaha, Ponca, Osage, Kansa, and Quapaw—which have been called Dhegiha by Dorsey, undoubtedly lived together as one tribe at some former time and were probably located on the Mississippi. Part moving farther down became known as “downstream people,” Quapaw, while those who went up were the “upstream people,” Omaha. These latter moved n. w. along the river and divided into the Osage, Kansa, Ponca, and Omaha proper. As to the more remote migrations that must have taken place in such a widely scattered stock, different theories are held. By some it is supposed that the various sections of the family have become dispersed from a district near that occupied by the Winnebago, or, on the basis of traditions recorded by Gallatin and Long, from some point on the n. side of the Great Lakes. By others a region close to the eastern Siouans is considered their primitive home, whence the Dhegiha moved westward down the Ohio, while the Dakota, Winnebago, and cognate tribes kept a more northerly course near the Great Lakes. The tribes of the Manahoac confederacy were encountered by Capt. John Smith in 1608, but after that time all of the eastern Siouans decreased rapidly in numbers through Iroquois attacks and European aggression. Finally the remnants of the northern tribes, consisting chiefly of Tutelo and Saponi, accompanied the Tuscarora northward to the Iroquois and were adopted by the Cayuga in 1753. On the destruction of their village by Sullivan in 1779 they separated, the Saponi remaining with the Cayuga in New York, while the Tutelo fled to Canada with other Cayuga. From the few survivors of the latter tribe, Hale and J. O. Dorsey obtained sufficient material to establish their Siouan connections, but they are now almost extinct. The fate of the Saponi is probably the same. The southern tribes of this eastern Siouan group consolidated with the Catawba, and continued to decrease steadily in numbers, so that at the present time there are only about 100 remaining of the whole confederated body. Some of the eastern Siouan tribes may have been reached by De Soto; they are mentioned by the Spanish captain Juan Pardo, who conducted an expedition into the interior of South Carolina in 1567.

The Biloxi were first noted by Iberville, who found them in 1699 on Pascagoula r., Miss. In the next century they moved s. w. and settled on Red r., La., where the remnant was found by Gatschet in 1886 and their affinities determined. These people reported that another section had moved into Texas and joined the Choctaw.

The Ofo, called Ushpi by their neighbors, are first mentioned by Iberville in 1699, but were probably encountered the year preceding by the missionaries De Montigny, Davion, La Source, and St Cosme, though not specifically mentioned. Unlike the other Yazoo tribes, they sided with the French in the great Natchez war and continued to live near the Tunica Indians. Their Siouan affinity was demonstrated by Swanton in 1908 through a vocabulary collected from the last survivor.

The first known meeting between any western Siouans and the whites was in 1541, when De Soto reached the Quapaw villages in e. Arkansas. The earliest notice of the main northwestern group is probably that in the Jesuit Relation of 1640, where mention is made of the Winnebago, Dakota, and Assiniboin. As early as 1658 the Jesuit missionaries had heard of the existence of 30 Dakota villages in the region n. from the Potawatomi mission at St Michael, about the head of Green bay, Wis. In 1680 Father Hennepin was taken prisoner by the same tribe.

In 1804–05 Lewis and Clark passed through the center of this region and encountered most of the Siouan tribes. Afterward expeditions into and through their country were numerous; traders settled among them in numbers, and were followed in course of time by permanent settlers, who pressed them into narrower and narrower areas until they were finally removed to Indian Territory or confined to reservations in the Dakotas, Nebraska, and Montana. Throughout all this period the Dakota proved themselves most consistently hostile to the intruders. In 1862 occurred a bloody Santee uprising in Minnesota that resulted in the removal of all of the eastern Dakota from that state, and in 1876 the outbreak among the western Dakota and the cutting off of Custer's command. Later still the Ghost-dance religion (q. v.) spread among the Sioux proper, culminating in the affair of Wounded Knee, Dec. 29, 1890.

It is impossible to make statements of the customs and habits of these people that will be true for the entire group. Nearly all of the eastern tribes and most of the southern tribes belonging to the western group raised corn, but the Dakota (except some of the eastern bands) and the Crows depended almost entirely on the buffalo and other game animals, the buffalo entering very deeply into the economic and religious life of all the tribes of this section. In the E. the habitations were bark and mat wigwams, but on the plains earth lodges and skin tipis were used. Formerly they had no domestic animals except dogs, which were utilized in transporting the tipis and all other family belongings, including children (see Travois), but later their place was largely taken by horses, the introduction of which constituted a new epoch in the life of all Plains tribes, facilitating their migratory movements and the pursuit of the buffalo, and doubtless contributing largely to the ultimate extinction of that animal.

Taking the reports of the United States and Canadian Indian offices as a basis and making a small allowance for bands or individuals not here enumerated, the total number of Indians of Siouan stock may be placed at about 40,800.

The Tutelo, Biloxi, and probably the rest of the eastern Siouan tribes were organized internally into clans with maternal descent; the Dakota, Mandan, and Hidatsa consisted of many non-totemic bands or villages, the Crows of non-totemic gentes, and the rest of the tribes of totemic gentes.

The Siouan family is divided as follows:

I. Dakota-Assiniboin group: 1, Mde-wakanton; 2, Wahpekute (forming, with the Mde-wakanton, the Santee); 3, Sisseton; 4, Wahpeton; 5, Yankton; 6, Yanktonai; 7, Teton (a) Sichangu or Brulé, (b) Itazipcho or Sans Arcs, (c) Sihasapa or Blackfeet, (d) Miniconjou, (e) Oohenonpa or Two Kettles, (f) Oglala, (g) Hunkpapa; 8, Assiniboin.

II. Dhegiha group: 1, Omaha; 2, Ponca; 3, Quapaw; 4, Osage (a) Pahatsi, (b) Utselta, (c) Santsukhdhi; 5, Kansa.

III. Chiwere group: 1, Iowa; 2, Oto; 3, Missouri.

IV. Winnebago.

V. Mandan.

VI. Hidatsa group: 1, Hidatsa; 2, Crows.

VII. Biloxi group: 1, Biloxi; 2, Ofo.

VIII. Eastern division: 1, Monacan group, almost extinct: A, Monacan confederacy—(a) Monacan, (b) Meipontsky, (c) Mohemencho; B, Tutelo confederacy—(a) Tutelo, (b) Saponi, (c) Occaneechi; C, Manahoac confederacy—(a) Manahoac, (b) Stegaraki, (c) Shackaconia, (d) Tauxitania, (e) Ontponea, (f) Tegninateo, (g) Whonkentia, (h) Hassinunga; D, Catawba group—(a) Catawba, (b) Woccon, (c) Sissipahaw, (d) Cape Fear Indians (?), (e) Warrennuncok (?), (f) Adshusheer, (g) Eno, (h) Waxhaw, (i) Sugeree, (j) Santee, (k) Wateree (?), (l) Sewee (?), (m) Congaree (?), all extinct except the Catawba; E, (a) Cheraw, (b) Keyauwee, both extinct; F, (a) Pedee (?),

Siscowet, Siskowit. See Siskawet.

Sisibotari. A branch of the Nevome in s. central Sonora, Mexico; so called from their chief. Described by Ribas (Hist. Triumphos, 380, 1645) as the most peaceable and cultivated of the tribes encountered up to that time; they differed much from the Yaqui and Mayo in dress, the men wearing short mantles in summer and long cloaks of cotton and agave thread in winter, and the women petticoats of highly dressed and painted skins or of cotton and agave, and also aprons, in summer, to which, in winter, was added a garment like a bishop's gown (roqueta). Their houses were of a kind of adobe unmixed with straw. Their dances are described as having been very gay but modest.

Sisichii. A former Chumashan village in "Dos Pueblos," near Santa Barbara, Cal. (Taylor quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, 1, 459, 1874.) Cf. Lisuchu, Sisuchi.

Sisika. The Swallow clan of San Felipe pueblo, N. Mex. It was almost extinct in 1895.

Sisika-háno.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., ix, 352, 1896 (háno = 'people').

Sisintlae (Sí'sinLaē, 'the Sí'nLaēs'). The name of gentes among the Goasila, Nakoaktok, Ninkish, Tlanitsis, and true Kwakiutl.

Síntlaē.—Boas in Petermanns Mitteil., pt. 5, 130, 1887. Sí'sinLaē.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 330, 1897.

Sisitcanogna. A former Gabrieleño rancharia in Los Angeles co., Cal., at a locality later known as Pear Orchard.—Ried (1852) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860.

Sisajulcioy (from Shi-shá'-we-ku-i). A former Chumashan village on the coast in Ventura co., Cal., in a locality now called Punta Gorda.

Oi-cá'-we-ku-i.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884. Sisajulcioy.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, July 24, 1863.

Siskawet. A name, with many variants, such as siskowet, siskiwit, siskowit, siskwoet, ciscowet, etc., for Salvelinus namaycush, var. siscowet, a large thick-bodied salmon of the deep waters of L. Superior. Its flesh possesses a fine flavor, but is so fat and oily as to render it almost unfit for food until after it has been salted and pickled. After it has been cured with salt, the fish commands in the market double the price of the Mackinaw salmon, of which it is now regarded as a variety. It is taken in large quantities by the Canadian French and by Indian fishermen by means of the torch and spear. The name is a Canadian French contraction and corruption of the cumbersome Chippewa name pemitewiskawet, 'that which has oily flesh.' The suffix -skawet is the participial form of the verbal suffix -skawe, denoting that a fish has flesh of a character denoted by the attributive prefix. The flesh of other animals is denoted by the suffix -shkiwe. (W. R. G.)

Siskhaslitun (Sis'-gas-li'-tún). A former village of the Chetco on the s. side of Chetco r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 236, 1890.

Siskiwit, Siskowit, Siskwoet. See Siskawet.

Sisolop. A former Chumashan village near Purísima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Sissabanonase. A former Chumashan village near Santa Barbara mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 24, 1863.

Sisseton ('lake village'). One of the seven original tribes of the Dakota. They appear to have formed a link between the eastern and western tribes, though generally included in the eastern division, with which they seem to have the closest affinity. Riggs says that the intercourse between the Mdewakanton on the Mississippi and lower Minnesota and the Wahpeton, Wahpekute, and a part of the Sisseton has been so constant that but slight differences are discoverable in their manner of speaking, though the western Sisseton show greater difference in their speech. This tribe was in existence at the coming of the whites. Rev. T. S. Williamson, who was well acquainted with the history, traditions, languages, and customs of the eastern Dakota, says: "From what was written on this subject by Hennepin, La Hontan, Le Sueur, and Charlevoix, and from the maps published under the superintendence of these authors, it is sufficiently clear that in the latter part of the 17th century the principal residence of the Isanyati Sioux [Mdewakanton, Wahpeton, Wahpekute, and Sisseton] was about the headwaters of Rum r., whence they extended their hunts to St Croix and Mississippi rs., and down the latter nearly or quite as far as the mouth of the Wisconsin." (Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1, 295, 1872.) The first recorded mention of the tribe is probably that of Hennepin (Descr. La., 1683), who said that in the neighborhood of Mille Lacs were many other lakes, whence issue several rivers, on the banks of which live the Isanti, Nadouessans Tinthonha (Teton), Oudebathon (Wahpeton) River people, Chongaske-ton (Sisseton), and other tribes, all comprised under the name Nadouessien. This locates the tribe in 1680 in the vicinity of Mille Lacs, not in the region of Rainy lake, as Hennepin's map appears to place them. In the Prise de Possession of May 1689, they are mentioned as living, the greater part of them, in the neighborhood of the Mdewakanton, in the interior N. E. of the Mississippi. Du Luth, who was in that region as early as July 1679, found them in the vicinity of the Wahpeton. The statement that a part of the tribe was in the vicinity of Mille Lacs at the time of Hennepin's visit (1680) indicates that the division into the two bands had already taken place. Pike states that the two divisions, the Kahra and the Sisseton proper, hunted eastward to the Mississippi and up that river as far as Crow Wing r. Long (Exped. St Peters R., 1824) names the divisions the Miakchakessa and Kahra, giving as the number of the latter 1,500, and that of the former 1,000. Lewis and Clark (1804) located them on the headwaters of Minnesota r. Schermerhorn, following Pike, said they were on the upper parts of Red r. of L. Winnipeg, and that they roved on the Mississippi and also on Crow Wing r., which was the boundary between them and the Chippewa. Brown (1817) gave their habitat as on Minnesota r. up to Big Stone lake. According to Ramsey (1849) they then claimed all the lands W. of Blue Earth r. to James r., S. Dak. Their principal village was located near L. Traverse. In 1854 the distributing point of annuities for the Sisseton and Wahpeton was then at Yellow Medicine r. Subsequently they were gathered on a reservation.

Lewis and Clark estimated the number of warriors in 1804 at 200, and a total population of about 800. According to Neill they numbered 2,500 in 1853. The combined population of the Sisseton and Wahpeton at L. Traverse res. in 1886 was 1,496. In 1909 there were 1,936 of both tribes at the Sisseton agency, S. Dak., and in North Dakota 980 Sisseton, Wahpeton, and Pakaksa, representing bands that fled thither after the Minnesota massacre of 1862.

Two subdivisions were mentioned by Pike (1811) and Long (1824), the Miakchakessa, or Sisseton proper, and the Kahra. Rev. S. R. Riggs, in a letter to Dorsey (1882), gives the following bands: Chanshdachikana; Tizaptan; Okopeya-Aindowapuskiyapi; Bawdecheshni; Ka; pozha; Ohdihe. Rev. E. Ashley, in a letter to Dorsey (1884), gives these, with the exception of the first, named from chief Sleepyeye, and adds the following: Witawaziyataotina; Itokakhtina; Kakhmintonwan; Maniti; Keze; Chankute. Bands that can not be identified with any of these are the Grail and Little Rock bands, Mechemeton, Red Iron band, and the Traverse des Sioux and Wabey bands.

The Sisseton made or joined in the following treaties with the United States: Prairie du Chien, Mich. Ter., July 15, 1830; St Peters, Minn., Nov. 30, 1836; Traverse des Sioux, Minn. Ter., July 23, 1851; Washington, D. C., June 19, 1858; Feb. 19, 1867; Lake Traverse res., Dak. Ter., Sept. 20, 1872 (unratified); agreement at Lac Traverse agency, Dak. Ter., May 2, 1873. By resolution of the Senate, June 27, 1860, the right and title of certain bands of Sioux, including the Sisseton, to lands embraced in the reservation on Minnesota r., were confirmed.

Sissipahaw. A former small tribe of North Carolina, presumably Siouan, from their alliance and associations with known Siouan tribes. They must have been an important tribe at one time, as Haw r., the chief head stream of Cape Fear r., derives its name from them, and the site of their former village, known in 1728 as Haw Old Fields, was noted as the largest body of fertile land in all that region. It was probably situated about the present Saxapahaw on Haw r., in the lower part of Alamance co., N. C. They were mentioned by Lawson in 1701, but he did not meet them. Nothing more is known of them beyond the general statement that they and other tribes of the region joined the Yamasee against the English in the war of 1715. (J. M.)

Sauxpa.—Vandera (1569) in Smith Collec. Doc. Fla., 17, 1857 (probably identical). Saxapahaw.—Bowen, Map Brit. Am. Plantations, 1760. Sippahawa.—Martin, Hist. Sisuch. A former Chumashan village near Santa Barbara, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 24, 1863.

Sisuchi. A former Chumashan village near Santa Inés mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal. (Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861). Cf. Lisuchu, Sisithii.

Sitaptapa (Si-tá'p-tá-pá). A former Chumashan village on or near the site of the present town of Nordhoff, Ventura co., Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Sitarky. A former Seminole village between Camp Izard and Ft King, w. Fla.; doubtless named from its chief.

Sitarky's.—H. R. Doc. 78, 25th Cong., 2d sess., map, 768-769, 1838.

Sitiku (Sí'tikú', or Sú'tá'gá'). A former Cherokee settlement on Little Tennessee r., at the entrance of Citico cr., in Monroe co., Tenn. The name, which can not be translated, is commonly spelled Citico, but appears also as Sattiquo, Settico, Settacoo, Sette, Sittiquo, etc.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 531, 1900.

Settacoo.—Timberlake, Memoirs, map, 1765. Sette.—Bartram, Travels, 371, 1792 (identical?). Sittiquo.—Doc. of 1755 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 142, 1887.

Sitintajea. A former rancheria connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Sitka (prob. meaning 'on Shi,' the native name of Baranof id.). A Tlingit tribe, named from their principal town, on the w. coast of Baranof id., Alaska. Their territory extends over all of this island and over the southern part of Chichagof. Pop. 721 in 1880, of whom 540 were in Sitka town; 815 in 1890. Former towns in the Sitka territory were Dahet, Keshkunuwu, Kona, Kustahekdaan, Tlanak, and Tluhashaiyikan. Silver Bay was a summer camp. Social divisions were Kagwantan, Katagwadi, Katkaavi, Kiksadi, Kokhittan, and Tluknahadi. See Old Sitka. (J. R. S.)

Sits-in-the-Middle. See Many Horns.

Sitting Bull (Tatanka Yotanka, 'sitting buffalo bull'). A noted Sioux warrior and tribal leader of the Hunkpapa Teton division, born on Grand r., S. Dak., in 1834, his father being Sitting Bull, alias Four Horns, a subchief. As a boy he was first known as Jumping Badger. He manifested hunting ability when but 10 years of age, in the pursuit of buffalo calves. When he was 14 he accompanied his father on the warpath against the Crows and counted his first coup on the body of a fallen enemy. On the return of the party his father made a feast, gave away many horses, and announced that his son had won the right to be known henceforth by his own name. According to the native interpretation of a Dakota winter count his name was Four Horn, and was changed to Sitting Bull when he "made medicine" in 1857. The name is quite common among the Plains tribes. He rapidly acquired influence in his own band, being especially skilful in the character of peacemaker. He took an active part in the Plains wars of the '60's, and first became widely known to the whites in 1866, when he led a memorable raid against Ft Buford. Sitting Bull was on the warpath with his band of followers from various tribes almost continuously from 1869 to 1876, either raiding the frontier posts or making war on the Crows or the Shoshoni, especially the former. His autographic pictorial record in the Army Medical Museum at Washington refers chiefly to contests with the Crows and to horse stealing.

SITTING BULL

His refusal to go upon a reservation in 1876 led Gen. Sheridan to begin against him and his followers the campaign which resulted in the surprise and annihilation of Custer's troop on Little Bighorn r., Mont., in June. During this battle, in which 2,500 to 3,000 Indian warriors were engaged, Sitting Bull was in the hills "making medicine," and his accurate foretelling of the battle enabled him "to come out of the affair with higher honor than he possessed when he went into it" (McLaughlin). After this fight the hostiles separated into two parties. Sitting Bull, in command of the western party, was attacked by Gen. Miles and routed; a large number of his followers surrendered, but the remainder of the band, including Sitting Bull himself, escaped to Canada, where they remained until 1881, when he surrendered at Ft Buford under promise of amnesty and was confined at Ft Randall until 1883. Although he had surrendered and gone upon a reservation, Sitting Bull continued unreconciled. It was through his influence that the Sioux refused to sell their land in 1888; and it was at his camp at Standing Rock agency and at his invitation that Kicking Bear organized the first Ghost dance on the reservation. The demand for his arrest was followed by an attempt on the part of some of his people to rescue him, during which he was shot and killed by Sergeants Red Tomahawk and Bullhead of the Indian police, Dec. 15, 1890. His son, Crow Foot, and several others, with six of the Indian police, were also killed in the struggle. Although a chief by inheritance, it was rather Sitting Bull's success as an organizer and his later reputation as a sacred dreamer that brought him into prominence. According to McLaughlin, "his accuracy of judgment, knowledge of men, a student-like disposition to observe natural phenomena, and a deep insight into affairs among Indians and such white people as he came into contact with, made his stock in trade, and he made 'good medicine.'" He stood well among his own people, and was respected for his generosity, quiet disposition, and steadfast adherence to Indian ideals. He had two wives at the time of his death (one of whom was known as Pretty Plume), and was the father of 9 children. His eldest son was called Louis.

Sittintac. A former rancharia connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Situchi. A former Chumashan village situated near Santa Inés mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Siuktun. A Chumashan village given by Taylor as having been situated near Santa Inés mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal., and said by the Ventura Indians to have been on the harbor of Santa Barbara.

Seyuktoon.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860.
Si-úk-tun.—Henshaw, Buena Ventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Siupam (or Suipam?). A tribe met by Fr. San Buenaventura y Olivares and Fr. Espinosa in Apr. 1709, at San Pedro Springs, San Antonio, Texas. The rancharia in which they were living was composed of this tribe, Chaulamas, and Sijames, and was estimated by Fr. Espinosa at 1,000 persons. (The Chaulamas were probably the Xarames, for in the Spanish of that day ch and x, as well as l and r, were frequently interchangeable. Moreover, this was the home of the Xarames.) The Pampopas, who had accompanied the padres from Medina r., remained at the rancharia when the latter continued their journey northeastward (Fray Isidro Felis de Espinosa Diario, 1709, MS). When the missionaries returned a few days later the rancharias had been moved down-stream, an indication of the unfixed character of their villages. The tribe is perhaps the same as the Siguipam, of the Texas coast country, who later were at San Francisco de la Espada mission. In 1754 a portion of the tribe deserted to the Rio Grande missions, but were brought back by Fr. Bartholomé García (MS. in Arch. Col. Santa Cruz, K. Leg. 19, no. 34). See Seguipam. (H. E. B.)

Siuslaw. A small Yakonan tribe formerly living on and near Siuslaw r., w. Oreg. It is now nearly extinct, a few survivors only being on the Siletz res. The following were the former villages of the Siuslaw as ascertained by Dorsey in 1884 (Jour. Am. Folklore, III, 230, 1890): Khaikuchum, Khachtais, Hauwiyat, Kumiyus, Khaklakw, Khakhaich, Hilakwitiyus, Thlachaus, Kwsichichu, Mithlausminthai, Stthukhwich, Chimuksaich, Waitus, Shkutch, Paauwis, Pilumas, Tiekwachi, Kumkwu, Tsatauwis, Kwuskwemus, Kwulhauunnich, Thlekuaus, Kwultsaiya, Pithlkwutsiaus, Wetsiaus, Kuskuseu, Kupimithla, Tsahais, Matsnikth, Pia, Khaiyumitu, Yukhwustitu, Kwunnumis, Tsiekhaweyathl.

Siwanoy (from their having been a sea-coast people, their name may be a corruption of Siwanak, 'salt people,' a dialectic form of Suwanak, a name applied by the Delawares to the English.—Gerard). One of the principal tribes of the Wap-pinger confederacy, formerly living along the N. shore of Long Island sd. from New York to Norwalk, Conn., and inland as far at least as White Plains. They were one of the seven tribes of the seacoast and had a number of villages, the principal one in 1640 being Poningo. (J. M.)

Sewonkeeg.—Owaneco (1700) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IV, 614, 1854 (trans.: 'western Indians'). Siwanoo.—De Laet (1633) in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., I, 296, 1841. Siwanoya.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 61, 1872. Sywanois.—Map of 1616 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., I, 13, 1856.

Siyita (Siyi'ta). A Cowichan tribe whose village was Skuhamen, at Agassiz, on lower Fraser r., Brit. Col.—Boas in 64th Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 454, 1894.

Skaddal. A tribe numbering 200 persons, found by Lewis and Clark in 1806 on Cataract (Klikitat) r., 25 m. N. of Big Narrows, in the present Washington, and mentioned by Robertson in 1846, under the name Saddals, as numbering 400. They subsisted by hunting deer and elk, and traded with the Kneeshur and Skilloot for prepared fish. Classed by Mooney as a division of the Pisuows living about Boston cr. and Kahchass lake, at the head of Yakima r.

Lower Yakima.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 417, 1855. Saddals.—Robertson (1846) in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 30th Cong., 1st sess., 9, 1848. Scad-dala.—Lewis and Clark Exped., Coues ed., III, 358, 1893. Skaddal.—Ibid., Allen ed., II, 475, 1814. Skaddals nation.—Ibid., Coues ed., III, 1255, 1893. Skaddat.—Clark (1806) in Orig. Skao (Sqa-i). A Haida town of the Kaidju-kegawai, formerly close to C. St James, at the S. end of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It is said to have been so named because its inhabitants here skinned the sea lions which they killed on the Isles Kerouart.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Skagit. A body of Salish on a river of the same name in Washington, particularly about its mouth, and on the middle portion of Whidbey id., especially at Penn's cove. According to Gibbs the population of the Skagit proper in 1853 was about 300. They are now on Swinomish res., Wash. Gibbs makes this division include the Kikiallu, Nukwatsamish, Towahha, Smalih, Sakumehu, Miskaiwhu, Miseek-wigweelis, Swinamish, and Skwomamish; but probably nothing more is meant by this classification than that the dialects of the several divisions were nearly related and the geographical position close. Nothing like political union appears to have existed among them.

Hum-a-luh.—Mackay quoted by Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 7, 1891 ('the people': own name). Sachet.—Wilkes, U. S. Expl. Exped., IV, 149, 1844. Sacket.—De Smet, Oregon Miss., 84, 1847. Scad-jat.—Mallet in Ind. Aff. Rep., 198, 1877. Scatchae.—Gibbs (misquoting Wilkes) in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 433, 1855. Sk'a'-jub.—McCaw, Puyallup MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1885 (Puyallup name).

Skagway (Cqague', a term that does not bear popular interpretation). A former Chilkat town at the head of Lynn canal, now noted as the terminus of the Yukon and White Horse railroad.

Cqague'.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904. Shkagué.—Krause (1882) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 580, 1906. Shkagway.—Nichols (1891), ibid. Skaguay.—Baker, ibid. Skagwa.—Ibid.

Skahakmehu ('numerous tribe'). A Salish division that resided where the Port Madison (Wash.) mill now stands, but now on Port Madison res.

Ska-hak-bush.—Mallet in Ind. Aff. Rep., 198, 1877. Ska-hak-mehu.—Boulet in letter, Mar. 22, 1886.

Skahasegao (Skä-hase'-gå-o). An ancient Seneca village on the site of Lima, Livingston co., N. Y.—Morgan, League Iroq., 314, 468, 1851.

Skahene-hadai (Sqahē'ne xū'da-i, 'Ska river people'). A subdivision of the Chaahl-lanas, a Haida family of the Eagle clan living in Alaska. Skahene is said to mean, in Tlingit, 'to cry over a river,' and it is related that at a time when this branch was almost exterminated they went up on a mountain above this river and cried.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Skaiakos (Squī'aqōs). A Seechelt sept with many settlements but no fixed abode (Hill-Tout in Jour. Anthr. Inst., 23, 1904). For general habitat see Seechelt.

Iaquahala.—Can. Ind. Aff., 78, 1878. Squid'lo.—Hill-Tout in Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1902. Squehala.—Can. Ind. Aff., 309, 1879. Squiahla.—Ibid., pt. II, 160, 1901. Squihala.—Ibid., 74, 1878.

Skaismetl. A Kwantlen village at New Westminster, on Fraser r., Brit. Col. Pop. 45 in 1909, including Kikait.

New Westminster.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. II, 72, 1902. Squai'ametl.—Hill-Tout in Ethnol. Surv. Can., 54, 1902. Tos'tatles.—Boas in Rep. B. A. A. S., 454, 1894.

Skalets (Squai'ets). A Kwantlen village on Stave r., an affluent of lower Fraser r., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Ethnol. Surv. Can., 54, 1902.

Skalschiltmish. A Salish division living, according to Gibbs, at the old Chimakum mission on Spokane r., Wash. Pop. of "Lower Spokan," 301 in 1908.

Ohokasschee.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 315, 1874. Oh-kiss-ohoo.—Winans in Ind. Aff. Rep., 23, 1870. Lower Spokan.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 702, 1901. Lower Spokanes.—Winans, op. cit. Skai-schil-t'nish.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 414, 1855.

Skaito. A camp on the w. coast of the Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., occupied by Haida at the time of the gold excitement at Gold Harbor in 1852-60. It is sometimes spoken of erroneously as a town and confused with Kaisun and Chaahl.

Skakaiek (Squai'ek). A Squawmish village community on the right bank of Squawmisht r., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Skakhaus (Sk'a'-quas). A Kuitsh village on lower Umpqua r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 231, 1890.

Skaleksun. The Lummi name of one of their temporary fishing villages on the w. side of Lummi id., Whatcom co., Wash.

Skaleksun.—Gibbs, MS. no. 248, B. A. E. Sky-laksun.—Fitzhugh in H. R. Ex. Doc. 87, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 75, 1857.

Skamoynumachs (Ska-moy-num-achs). Given by Ross (Advent., 289, 1849) as one of the Okinagan tribes, but the name is not met with elsewhere.

Skanahwahti ('beyond the stream.'—Hewitt). An Onondaga, known generally to the whites as John Buck, the fire-keeper of his tribe in Canada; died about 1893 at Brantford, Ontario. He gave Horatio Hale valuable aid in preparing the Iroquois Book of Rites (1883), and was much esteemed. He was official keeper and interpreter of the tribal wampum. See Skandawati. (W. M. B.)

Skanapa. A former Choctaw town noted by d'Anville. It was on the e. side of the head of a tributary of the Sukenatcha, probably Running Tiger cr., Kemper co., Miss.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., VI, 432, 1902.

Skandawati ('beyond the stream'). An Onondaga chief, of the Turtle clan, who led an embassy to the Hurons in Oct. 1647. He returned 15 Huron prisoners and bore 7 great belts. Early in the following year the Hurons sent a new embassy, and Skandawati and another remained as hostages. The Mohawk destroyed the party, and Skandawati was so mortified that he killed himself. The other had a like sense of honor, but was less rash. His name appears also as Scandaouati (Jes. Rel. 1648, 56, 1858) and Scandawati (Hale, Iroq. Book Rites, 160, 1883). (Cf. Skanahwahti. (W. M. B.)

Skaniadario (Seneca: Skaniadai'io, 'it is a very fine lake,' commonly rendered "Handsome Lake"). A former federal chief of the Seneca; born at the village of Ganawagus, near Avon, in the Genesee valley, N. Y., about 1735; died at Onondaga, near Syracuse, in 1815. By birth he belonged to the Turtle clan, and was a half-brother of Cornplanter (q. v.) on his father's side. Although thus closely related to Cornplanter, he did not, like his illustrious half-brother, acquire marked distinction during the American Revolution, which was one of the most trying periods in the history of the Seneca and their confederates. On the contrary, the greater part of his life was spent in dissipation and idleness; but late in life, realizing that the worst curse of his race was the evil of drunkenness and the traffic in liquor, he sought to establish a better system of morals among his people, who were then passing through a transition period between their ancient mode of life and modern civilization. His precepts and teachings, based largely on the ancient custom and faith, but recast to adjust them to the new conditions, contemplated the regulation of family life by pointing out the respect and duties that should subsist between husband and wife and between parents and children, and the need of chastity and continence, and by the inculcation of habits of industry and thrift. About 1796, while living at Connewango on Allegheny r., at Warren, Pa., Skaniadario was prostrated, it is said, by epilepsy and partial paralysis. For four years he lay suffering, and having lost all hope of recovery, resigned himself to death. According to his own story, one afternoon he heard voices calling him out. He arose in spirit and went outside, where, at a short distance from the house among some shrubbery, he saw four spirits in human shape, who assured him that they were merely messengers to him from the Artificer of Life. Of these, three bore shrubs in their hands, on which hung several kinds of fruit, which he was told to eat, when he was at once restored by their magical efficacy. Thereupon the messengers revealed to him by means of a great number of precepts the will of the Artificer of Life, on a variety of subjects; he was further told to promulgate these teachings among the tribes of the Iroquois, and was led by the messengers into the white man's hell, in order to permit him to witness the punishments that are in store for the lawless and the drunkard, the better to enable him to warn his people of the need of reform. The watchers at his bedside thought he was dead, but after a long trance he suddenly arose, and from that time rapidly recovered health. He visited the several Iroquois villages from year to year, preaching his new doctrines with power and eloquence. It is reported that many so-called pagans gave up their dissolute habits, becoming sober and moral men and women, among whom "discord and contention gave place to harmony and order, and vagrancy and sloth to ambition and industry." It was this reformed religion of Handsome Lake, or the so-called paganism of the modern Iroquois, that has so steadfastly resisted the advance of Christianity and education among the Iroquois tribes. At the present time the seat of this faith is in Canada, on the Grand River res., where it has about 1,200 adherents; but there are small bodies who still profess to follow the precepts of Handsome Lake dwelling on the Cattaraugus and the Allegany res., and on the Onondaga res. in New York. Each autumn these "pagans" assemble to hear the doctrines of Skaniadariio preached to them. In 1802, Skaniadariio with a number of associates visited Washington to explain to President Jefferson the nature of their doctrine in order to receive recognition of it by the Government for the purpose of counteracting the inroads of Christianity. The President, through the Secretary of War, commended the new doctrines in a letter, which was mistaken by the Seneca for a license permitting Skaniadariio to preach his new faith to the Indians. (J. N. B. H.)

Skannayutenate (probably from Skanë-nyuté, 'rock again protrudes.'—Hewitt). A Cayuga village, destroyed by Gen. Sullivan in 1779. It was on the w. side of Cayuga lake, n. e. of the present village of Canoga, Seneca co., N. Y., and nearly opposite the Cayuga towns on the e. The lake is narrow there, and the Cayuga occupied both shores. (W. M. B.)

Skanowethlunne (Ska-no'-uěčl yún'ně). Given as a Takelma band or village on the s. side of Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 235, 1890.

Skanuka (Sxa-nu-xā). A name applied by Dawson (Queen Charlotte Ids., 134, 1880) to one of the four clans into which he erroneously supposed the Haida to be divided. It may be otherwise spelled Sg'anag-wa, and is the native term for "supernatural power." Dawson translates it "killer-whale," but the more usual name for the killer-whale is sg'ana, though this animal was indeed so named because it was held to be supernatural. Dawson's mistake arose from the fact that the Tsimshian of the mainland opposite are divided into four clans, and among the Haida the killer-whale is a very important crest belonging to one of the two clans. (J. R. S.)

Skappa ('sandy land'). A Ntlakypamuk village on the e. bank of Fraser r., near Boston Bar, Brit. Col. Pop. 17 in 1909. Skāpa.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1899. Skappah.—Can. Ind. Aff., 309, 1879. Skepah.—Ibid., 78, 1878. Skopah.—Brit. Col. map, Ind. Aff., Victoria, 1872. Skuppa.—Can. Ind. Aff. Rep. 1904, sec. II, 71, 1905. Skuppah.—Ibid., map, 1891.

Skasahah. A band of Cowichan on Vancouver id., numbering 20 in 1882, the last time their name appears.

Ska-sah-ah.—Can. Ind. Aff., 258, 1882.

Sākhālis.—Allen, Rep. on Alaska, 38, 1887. Skatalis.—Ibid., 120.

Skatehook.—Barber, Hist. Coll. Mass., 91, 1841. Statehook.—Hoyt, Antiq. Res., 209, 1824.

Skāocin.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887. 'Skaui'can.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Skaukel. A Chilliwack village in s. British Columbia, with 30 inhabitants in 1909.

Skauton. A village near Sandwich, Barnstable co., Mass., in 1685. It seems to have been on Buzzards bay, and was probably subject to either the Wampanoag or the Nauset.—Hinckley (1685) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., v, 133, 1861.

Skeakunts (Sk-ě'akunts). A Squawmish village community on Burrard inlet, Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Skeawatsut (Skē'awasut). A Squawmish village community at Pt Atkinson, E. side of Howe sd., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Skecheramouse. A former division of the Salish living on the Colville trail, Wash. Stevens calls them a band of Spokane.

Ske-chei-a-mouse.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 414, 1855. Ske-cher-a-mouse.—Stevens in Ind. Aff. Rep., 429, 1854.

Skedans (corrupted from Gidansta, 'from his daughter,' the name of its chief). An important Haida town of the Kagiaks-kegawai family, formerly on a point of land which extends into Hecate str. from the E. end of Louise id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. The town was known to its inhabitants as Kona or Huadji-lanas. They were always on the best of terms with those of the Tsimshian town of Kitkatla, whence they imported many new customs and stories into the Haida country. John Work, 1836–41, assigned to this town 30 houses and 738 inhabitants. The old people remember 27 houses; in 1878 Dawson noted about 16 houses. It has been abandoned for several years, though a number of housepoles are still standing. (J. R. S.)

Skeinah (contr. of Uñskiniyī). A Cherokee settlement on Toccoa r., in the present Fannin co., N. Ga., about the period of the removal of the tribe in 1839. From a confusion of the name with the Cherokee askina, an evil spirit or malevolent ghost, it has sometimes been rendered "Devil Town."

Skēkaitin (Skēka'itīn, 'place of coming up above, or reaching the top'). A village of the Upper Fraser band of Ntlak-yapamuk, on the W. side of Fraser r., 43 m. above Lytton, Brit. Col.

Skāikai'Eten.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1899. Skēka'itīn.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 172, 1900.

Skelautuk (Sqēla'utūq, 'painted house,' on account of a painted post in a house there). A former village or camp of the Pilalt, a Cowichan tribe on lower Chilliwack r., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Ethnol. Surv. Can., 48, 1902.

Skeleton. See Anatomy.

Skelsh (Sqēlc, 'standing up,' referring to "Siwash rock"). A Squawmish village community on Burrard inlet, Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 475, 1900.

Skelten (Sqē'ltēn). A village of the Ewawoos tribe of the Cowichan on lower Fraser r., Brit. Col., 2 m. above Hope.—Boas in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 454, 1894.

Skona (Sqē'na). A Haida town prominent in the family stories, situated just S. of Sand Spit pt., Moresby id., Brit. Col. According to tradition it was composed of 5 rows of houses, each occupied by a single family of the Raven clan. These 5 are said to have been the Tadjil-lanas, Kunal-lanas, Yaku-lanas, Koetas, and Stlengal-lanas. The Daiyuahl-lanas claimed that their own chief was chief of the town.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 279, 1905.

Skenandoa (Skēñnoñ'don', 'deer.'—Hewitt). A noted Oneida chief who died at Oneida Castle, Tryon co., N. Y., Mar. 11, 1816, reputed to be 100 years of age; in all probability, however, he was not so old, otherwise he would have been nearly 70 years of age before appearing in history. He is described as a tall, robust man of intelligent appearance. During the first part of his life he was addicted to drink. In 1775, while at Albany attending to business in behalf of his tribe, he became drunk and the next morning found himself in the street, everything of value, including the sign of his chieftainship, having been taken from him. Feeling the disgrace, he resolved never again to become intoxicated, a resolution which he strictly maintained during his remaining years. He seems to have been reformed and brought into the church chiefly through the influence of Rev. Samuel Kirkland, missionary to the Oneida, to whom Skenandoa was so greatly attached that he asked to be buried by the side of the latter in the cemetery at Clinton, N. Y. He was the friend of the colonists previous to the Revolution, and during the war staunchly espoused the cause of the people of the United States. He watched and aided in repelling Canadian invasions, and on one occasion preserved from massacre the people of the settlements at German Flats, Herkimer co., N. Y. It was chiefly through his influence that the Oneida declaration of neutrality in the Revolutionary war was issued in May 1775, bearing the names of Skenandoa (Johnko' Skeanendon) and eleven other principal men of the tribe (Stone, Life of Brant, I, 63, 1838). His name in various forms is signed, always by his mark, to deeds of cession, treaties, agreements, etc., with the state of New York between 1790 and 1811, and to the treaty with the United States, Dec. 2, 1794. He became blind and is credited with saying that he was "an old hemlock, dead at the top." Lewis H. Morgan, the ethnologist, sometimes wrote under the pen-name Skenandoa. (C. T. W. M. B.)

Skhakhwaiyutslu (Sqa'-quai yu'-talu). An Alsea village on the S. side of Alsea r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 230, 1890.

Skichistan. A Shuswap village on Deadman r., a N. affluent of Thompson r., Brit. Col. Population of all Deadman's r. Indians, 117 in 1909.

Dead Man's Creek.—Can. Ind. Aff., 259, 1882 (includes all the other Shuswap on this river). Sket-shiotin.—Ibid., 189, 1883. Skichistan.—Ibid., pt. II, 166, 1901. Ski-shis-tin.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 41, 1891. Stichistan band.—Can. Ind. Aff., 240, 1902.

Skicoak (possibly a contraction of Virginia Algonquian (Renape) Maskikok, 'swamp people.'—Gerard). A large village in 1584, possibly Siouan, on Roanoke r., about 6 days' travel above the mouth of Albemarle sd., probably in Virginia. It may have been identical with Occaneechi. Skicoack.—Amadas (1585) in Smith (1629), Va., I, 83, 1819. Skicoak.—Strachey (1612), Va., 143, 1849. Skioah.—Martin, N. C., I, 12, 1829.

Skidai-lanas (Skidū'-i lū'nas, 'powerless town-people'). A Haida family of the Eagle clan, belonging to the geographic group known as Gunghet-haidagai, or Ninistints people. It is said to have been a branch of the Gunghet-kegawai, and owned the ancient town of Hlgadun.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 272, 1905.

Skidaokao (Skī'daoqao, 'eggs of Ski'dao'). One of the principal Haida families of the Raven clan on Masset inlet, Brit. Col., said to have been named from a man called Skidao. Formerly these people lived with several other families in the town of Naikun, whence they moved to Masset and owned the town, now known by that name, until very recent times. (J. R. S.)

Skidegate. One of the two or three inhabited Haida towns on Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col.; situated at the entrance to an inlet of the same name on its N. shore. The native names for this town were Hlgaiu and Hlgagilda, Skidegate being the corruption by whites of a name of the chief, Sgedagits (Sgē'dagits). Anciently owned by the Hlgaiu-lanas, it was given over to the Gitins, according to tradition, in payment for an injury received by a member of the latter family. According to John Work there were 48 houses between the years 1836 and 1841, with 738 people. The last row of native houses which stood here numbered only 20, which would give a population of 300 to 400. In 1909 there were 239 people, living almost entirely in houses patterned after those of the whites. There is a Methodist mission at Skidegate, and the Salvation Army has some followers. All the people are nominally Christians. The name of this town has been adopted to designate the Skittagetan family (q. v.). (J. R. S.)

Skidi (probably from tskiri, 'wolf,' or skirirara, 'wolves standing in water,' referring to a tribal tradition). One of the tribes of the Pawnee confederacy (q. v.), sometimes called Wolf Pawnee, and by the French Pawnee Loup. That the Skidi were closely associated with the idea of the wolf is evident from the sign language, in which they are designated by the sign for that animal. The speech of the Skidi differed slightly from that of the other 3 Pawnee tribes. According to tradition the Skidi and Arikara were once united, but became separated during the northward migration, the Arikara keeping to the Missouri valley and the Skidi settling on Loup r., Nebr., where finally the other 3 Pawnee tribes built their villages. The wanderings and adventures of the Skidi are matters of tradition rather than of history. They have so long regarded the valley of the Loup as their home that they have located in that vicinity the supernatural underground dwellings of the mythic animals which preside over the ceremonies of their secret societies. When first known to the white race the Skidi were farther N. than the other 3 Pawnee tribes. Tradition indicates that this tribe was the first to push northward from their old home in the S. W. There are stories of the Skidi having been conquered by the other Pawnee tribes, but these may refer rather to local tribal quarrels and not imply subjugation, for the Skidi have ever kept their distinctive organization and have tenaciously preserved their tribal rites with their esoteric teachings.

According to information obtained by Bolton from Spanish manuscript sources, a part of the Skidi (or "Pani-Maha," as they were called) moved southward and about 1770 approached the Texas border. One of the conditions of the general peace that was established between the Spaniards and the northern Texas tribes in 1772 was that these tribes should consent to be moved S., away from the influence of the Pani-Maha (Viceroy to the King of Spain, Nov. 26, 1772, MS. in Archivo Gen., Corr. of Viceroys, Bucareli no.

654). About 1777 a group of the Pani-Maha joined the Taovayas (Tawehash) settlement. When Mezières was there in 1778 they had temporarily withdrawn, but he urged them to return, which they did within a year. From this time on they seem to have formed an important part of the Taovayas settlement, which was called by Sibley, in 1805, that of the "Panis or Towiaches" (Hist. Sketch, 1806). A Mexican map of 1862 shows a "Pannis" village near the head of Sulphur cr., N. E. Texas (Map no. 1020, Sec. de Cartografía, Depto de Fomento, Mexico).

During the two centuries prior to their removal from Nebraska to Indian Ter. in 1874 the Skidi, in common with the other Pawnee tribes, fought to hold their hunting grounds against intruders, and to that end strove for the possession of horses. The securing of this class of booty was the chief incentive of war parties, and the possession of ponies became the sign of wealth. The history of the Skidi does not differ materially from that of the other Pawnee tribes. They joined in the treaties with the United States, served as scouts in its army, and followed their kindred to Oklahoma, where they live to-day, owning lands in severalty as citizens of the United States. There were no missions established especially for the Skidi; they were included in those maintained for all the Pawnee.

The organization of the Skidi is perhaps more fully carried out in accordance with the religious beliefs of the people than that of the other Pawnee tribes. They say they were organized by the stars, which powers "made them into families and villages, taught them how to live and how to perform their ceremonies." Five villages formed the central group. The village at the w. led in religious ceremonies and had no secular function except in times of dire distress. The other 4 villages of the group were situated as at the corners of a square, the sides of which faced the cardinal directions. Following an established rotation, each village led in tribal affairs during one year—a winter and a summer. The position of these 5 villages and of the other 17 of the tribe were all fixed by the position of the stars which had given them their shrines and ceremonies, so that the Skidi villages on the earth were like a reflection of their stars in the heavens. The star gave its name to the shrine, and the village took its name from the shrine or from some incident connected with its bestowal by the star. A secular name indicative of locality was sometimes added. The shrine was given by the star to a certain man, and his descendants became its hereditary keepers.

The immediate care and protection of the shrine devolved on a woman descendant. The ceremonies and rituals pertaining to the shrine were in charge of a priesthood, into which anyone of good character might enter after instruction and the performance of certain duties.

To the Skidi the universe was dual—male and female—and on the conjunction of these two forces depended the perpetuation of all forms of life. A ceremony exemplifying this belief, in which was the sacrifice of a girl, typical of the evening star, to the masculine morning star, was performed among the Skidi as late as the first quarter of the 19th century (see Petalesharo). The various ceremonies of the villages began with the first thunder in the spring and closed when the winter sleep set in. The social customs and avocations of the Skidi did not differ from those of the other Pawnee tribes.

Skidirah (Takiri rah'ra, 'the wolves standing in the pools'). A band of the Skidi Pawnee, so named by other Skidi because long ago, while camped on Loup, Nebr., they obtained so much meat while an immense buffalo herd was crossing that they began to take only the hides, leaving the carcasses on the river ice, which, melting, formed small pools, around which many wolves gathered — Grinnell, Pawnee Hero Stories, 238, 1889. Skidi rah'ra. — Grinnell, Pawnee Hero Stories, 238, 1889. Takiri rah'ra. — F. Skil. A local name of the black candlefish (Anoplopoma fimbria), an excellent food fish of the waters of the N. Pacific coast, particularly about Queen Charlotte Id., Brit. Col. The word is derived from sqil, the name of this fish in the Haida language. (A. F. C.)

Skilakh. — Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 29, 1884.

Skilloot. A Chinookan tribe found by Lewis and Clark in 1806 residing on both sides of Columbia r. in Washington and Oregon, above and below the entrance of Cowlitz r., and numbering in all 2,500 souls. The Hullootell may have been a band of them (Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, III, 196; VI, 68, 117, 1905). They were among the tribes almost exterminated by the fever epidemic of 1823. Later their principal village was Cooniac, at Oak Point, Wash. In 1850 Lane placed their number at 200, but as a tribe they disappeared from view a few years later. The Seamysty appear to have been a division. (L. F.)

Skin. See Antimony.

Skin and skin dressing. In the domestic economy of the Indians skins were his most valued and useful property, as they became later his principal trading asset, and a mere list of the articles made of this material would embrace nearly half his earthly possessions. Every kind of skin large enough to be stripped from the carcass of beast, bird, or fish was used in some tribe or another, but those in most general use were those of the buffalo, elk, deer, antelope, beaver, ermine, certain large birds in ceremonial costumes, the jackrabbit in the Paiute country, the seal and walrus, with the salmon and wolf-fish, among the Eskimo.

Among the principal belongings made in whole or in part from skins may be named tipis, parfleche boxes, feather boxes, bed covers, pillows, tobacco pouches, medicine bags, pounding huts (upon which to mash and spread out berries, pemmican, etc.), saddle blankets, horse and dog harness, the bullboat of the upper Missouri tribes, the kaiaik of the Eskimo; fishing lines, nets, etc.; clothing in all its parts, from robes and shirts to leggings and moccasins; shields, body armor, pictograph records, ceremonial masks, and cradles.

The methods employed for dressing skins were very much the same everywhere N. of Mexico, the difference being chiefly in the chemicals used and in the amount of labor given to the task. Among the Plains tribes, with which the art is still in constant practice nearly according to the ancient method, the process consists of 6 principal stages, viz, fleshing, scraping, braining, stripping, graining, and working, for each of which a different tool is required. When skins are dressed for robes the hair is not removed. A number of hides are usually dressed at the same time, the women working together in the open air. Sunshine, without too great heat, is essential for the best result.

The fleshing process begins as soon as possible after the hide is stripped from the carcass, while the skin is still soft and moist. The hide is staked out upon the ground, fleshy side up, when two women, working together, scrape off the flesh and fat by means of a sort of gouge with serrated edge, anciently made from the leg bone of some large animal, for which is now substituted a similar iron instrument procured from the traders. By means of a loop going over the wrist the strength of the blow is increased, the worker kneeling or bending over the skin.

Next comes the scraping, a very laborious process, the instrument used being a sort of short adz, made of wood or elk-horn, with a blade of stone or iron set at a right angle to the handle. Several women work together. The hide is staked out, hair side up, with a bed of old dressed skin under it to break the force of the blow, and thus prevent tearing, as well as to keep the dressed surface clean. Each side is scraped in turn, the final scraping being the more delicate operation. The hair and the skin shavings are saved for filling pillows, or are sometimes boiled into soup.

Then comes the braining process, in which the skin is thoroughly anointed with a mixture of cooked brains and liver, grease, and pounded soaproot (yucca), all mixed together and applied with a sponge of soaproot fiber. A little salt is frequently added. The liver is hashed, or sometimes chewed, to render it fine enough before cooking, and approximately the whole brain and liver of the animal are required to dress its hide. The braining is an easy and rapid process, after which a bundle of dried grass is laid in the center of the hide and saturated with hot water, when the corners of the hide are brought together over it in bag fashion, and the skin tightly twisted into a solid ball, and hung up to soak overnight for the next process. According to Schoolcraft (Narr. Jour., 323, 1821), the eastern Sioux dressed their buffalo skins with a decoction of oak bark, which he surmises may have been an idea borrowed from the whites. According to La Flesche, liver is not used in the dressing process by the Ponca, Omaha, and Oto, and meat broth is sometimes substituted for brains, while the hide is soaked in the running stream overnight. The Maricopa of Arizona use the castor bean in the tanning process.

Next comes the stripping, intended to squeeze out the surplus moisture and the dressing mixture. The dampened hide is first opened out and twisted into a rope in order to expel as much moisture as can be thus dislodged, after which it is stretched tightly, at an angle of about 45 degrees, in a frame consisting of a crosspiece supported by 2 stout forked poles, the lower end of the skin being staked to the ground. The stripping is done by 2 women working together, the instrument being a broad blade about 6 in. long, set in a bone handle, and much resembling a small hoe blade. The ancient tool was of stone. The instrument being grasped horizontally in both hands, with the blade pressing heavily upon the skin, it is drawn steadily from top to bottom, causing a thin stream of water to ooze out before the blade as it descends. As one woman nears the bottom her partner follows along the same track, before the moisture can work back under the blade. In this way the work goes on to the end over the whole surface of the skin, after which the skin is left suspended in the frame to dry and bleach until it is ready for graining. This is done with a globular piece of bone, as large as can be conveniently held in the hand, cut from the spongy portion of the humerus of a buffalo or other large animal. With this the whole surface of the skin is rubbed as with sandpaper to reduce the hide to uniform thickness and smoothness and to remove any hanging fibers. After this the breaks and holes are repaired with an awl and sinew thread. According to La Flesche, the semiagricultural Omaha and Pawnee also rub corn-meal over the skin to hasten the drying process.

Then comes the process of working or softening, to render the skin pliable. This is done by drawing the skin for some time in seesaw fashion across a rope of twisted sinew stretched between two trees a few feet apart. It is sometimes drawn first around the trunk of a rough-barked tree for a short time, two women again working together, one at each end of the skin; this treatment gives the skin its final softness. Afterward it is cleaned with a wash of white chalk clay in water, put on thick with a bunch of root fiber or dried grass for a brush, and brushed off when dry.

For parflèche purposes the tanning process is omitted. For making shields the hide is shrunk over a fire until it is of twice its original thickness and correspondingly tougher, being sometimes anointed before the operation, as already described. The process for deer skins and smaller skins is naturally less laborious than for buffalo (or cow) hides, and skins of panthers, wildcats, etc., intended for quivers, boys' coats, and pouches, are dressed with the hair on. Among the coast tribes the scraper is frequently a mussel shell or an oyster shell. In California and along the Pacific coast generally a rib bone is used, and the skin is laid over an inclined log instead of being staked on the ground. In the eastern timber country and in the Arctic region hides are usually smoked to render them impervious to moisture, and urine takes the place of soaproot in the dressing mixture. Bleaching is effected by the action of the sun's rays on wet skins. Among the Eskimo, for lack of summer sunshine the skin is sometimes dried over the fire or by wrapping it around the human body. Skins of the seal and walrus, and of birds and fish, all require special processes, while for intestines, pericardiums, and other internal membranes, used as water jars, paint bags, etc., the preparation is limited to softening and dyeing. It is doubtful if skin dyeing was commonly practised in former times, although every tribe had some method of skin painting. The Omaha, however, according to La Flesche, procured a dark-blue or black dye by combining the bark of the white maple with pulverized and roasted yellow ocher. The Plains tribes use the juice from the leaf of the prickly pear as a mordant to fix the painted design, and obliterate it, when so desired, by rubbing it over with a piece of roasted liver.

The process of preparing skins, as described above, pertains more particularly to the northern and western tribes of the United States. The Choctaw, Cherokee, and probably all the tribes that inhabited the area eastward from the Mississippi to the Atlantic and s. of the Algonquian tribes, followed a somewhat different method, which is thus described by David I. Bushnell, jr., as witnessed by him among the Choctaw of Louisiana:

The skin to be dressed is first soaked in water several hours or during a night. Being removed from the water it is placed over a log which has been smoothed so as to form an even surface. While in this position the hair or fur is removed by being scraped with an instrument resembling a drawknife, now made by inserting a metal blade in a long wooden handle. Next the skin is placed in a wooden mortar, together with a mixture of corn-meal, eggs, and a small quantity of water. It is then beaten with a wooden pestle until it becomes thoroughly saturated with the mixture. This conforms with the statement made by Lawson more than two centuries ago, when he wrote of the Indians of Carolina. With regard to their method of dressing skins, he alluded to "young Indian corn beaten to a pulp," used in the place of the brains of animals, to soften the skins. The combination of eggs and corn-meal would probably affect the skins in the same manner as green corn. After the process of beating or pounding, the skin is stretched on a perpendicular frame, consisting of two up-rights and two horizontal bars. It is then scraped and rubbed until dry, the instrument consisting of a piece of metal set in a wooden handle extending in the same direction. When dry, the skin is removed from the frame; but it is then stiff. It is softened by being pulled back and forth over a stake driven into the ground, the top of the stake having previously been rounded and smoothed to prevent tearing the skin. This process of dressing a skin makes it very white and soft.

If a skin is to be smoked, a pit is first dug in the ground. A fire is then made in the pit and allowed to burn until a mass of hot ashes and glowing embers accumulates. Pieces of damp, rotten oak are placed on the ashes, causing a dense smoke. The skin, being previously dressed as described, is stretched over the pit and allowed to remain in the smoke two or three hours.

If the skin is to be dressed with the hair or fur remaining, it is first softened with a little clear water, after which it is spread over a log and scraped on the inner surface to remove all particles of flesh. The inside is then thoroughly rubbed with a mixture of eggs, corn-meal, and water, great care being taken not to wet the outside or fur. When the skin is nearly dry it is worked back and forth over the smooth and rounded top of a stake driven in the ground.

There are but few detailed descriptions of the skin-dressing processes of the tribes within the limits of the United States. Among these is Lawson's account of the method formerly in use in Carolina (Hist.

Car., 338, reprint 1860), Kroeber's account of the Arapaho process (Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xviii, pt. 1, 1902), and Wissler's for the Siksika (Ontario Archæol. Rep. for 1906). Good descriptions of Eskimo methods are given by Boas, Murdoch, and Nelson in the 6th, 9th, and 18th Reps. respectively of the B. A. E.; of the Nascapsee process by Turner in 11th Rep. B. A. E.; of the British Columbia method by Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., ii, pt. 4, 1900; and of that used by the Chukchi of n. e. Siberia by Bogoras in vol. vii, pt. 1, of the same series. Skistlainai-hadai (Sk'ī'sLa-i na-i xadā'-i, 'people of the house where they always have plenty of food'). A subdivision of the Yaku-lanas, a Haida family of the Raven clan; probably named from a house.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 271, 1905.

Skitswish. A Salish tribe on a river and lake of the same name in n. Idaho. The name Cœur d'Alène (French 'Awl-heart'), by which they are popularly known, was originally a nickname used by some chief of the tribe to express the size of a trader's heart. The Skitswish bear a high reputation for industry, self-respect, and good behavior. In 1909 533 were enumerated as belonging to the Cœur d'Alène res., Idaho.

Skittagetan Family. The name applied to a linguistic family composed of the Indians usually known as Haida (q. v.). It was taken from Sqē'dagits, a name of one of the Haida town chiefs, which seems to mean 'son of the chiton' [mol-lusk]. This was first erroneously applied to the town of Hlgagilda, of which he was head chief, and later, under the form Skittagets (see Skidegate), was applied by Gallatin to the people speaking this language, whence it was adopted by Powell. = Haida.—Tolmie and Dawson, Comp. Ohkituk.—11th Census, Alaska, 70, 1898. Shittok.—Post route map, 1903.

Skiau (S'k'lau', 'beaver'). A Squawmish village community on the left bank of Squawmisht r., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Skoachais (Sk'ōatcai's, 'deep hole in water'). A Squawmish village community on Burrard inlet, Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. B. A. A. S., 475, 1900.

Skogari. The Tutelo village in 1748; situated on the n. branch of the Susquehanna, in the present Columbia co., Pa. At the date named it was "the only town on the whole continent inhabited by Tutelees, a degenerate remnant of thieves and drunkards (De Schweinitz, Life of Zeisberger, 149, 1870). It was to this village that the Tutelo moved from Shamokin.

Skohwak (Skorwā'k, 'skinny [people]'.—Hill-Tout). A village of the Ntlakyapamuk, on the w. side of Fraser r., about 15 m. above Yale, Brit. Col. Pop. 11 in 1897, the last time the name appears. Skorwā'k.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 169, 1900. Skuhwak.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1892, 312, 1893. Skūōūa'k'k.—Hill-Tout in *Rep. Skoiyase ('place of whortleberries'.—Morgan.) A former Seneca village at the site of Waterloo, Seneca co., N. Y. It was destroyed by a detachment of Gen. Sullivan's army, under Col. John Harper, Sept. 8, 1779. At that time it contained about 18 houses, and was surrounded by orchards of peach and apple trees. On Sept. 3, 1879, the centennial of this event was celebrated, at which time a monument was erected in the village park at Waterloo. (G. P. D.)

Skoka. A name among herbalists for the skunk-cabbage (Symplocarpus foetidus), "skoka of the Indians" (Rafinesque, 1830). The name is probably short for Lenape (Delaware) s'kākawīnsh, 'skunk-weed'. (W. R. G.)

Skoke. A New England name for the pokeberry (Phytolacca decandra). Probably derived from Massachusetts m'skok, 'that which is red' (Trumbull), or m'skwak. (W. R. G.)

Skokomish ('river people'). A body of Salish who, according to Fells, form one of three subdivisions of the Twana (q. v.). They lived at the mouth of Skokomish r., which flows into the upper end of Hoods canal, Wash., where a reservation of the same name has been set aside for them. They officially numbered 203 in 1909, but this figure includes the two other subdivisions of the Twana. Hokamish.—Lane quoted by Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, I, 521, 1853. Kokomish.—*Ind. Aff. Skoton. One of the names applied to the Athapascans formerly dwelling on or near Rogue r., Oreg. They were included by Parker (Jour., 257, 1840) among the Umpqua. The treaty of Nov. 18, 1854 (Sen. Ex. Doc. 48, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 10, 1854) was made by the Chasta, Scoton, and Umpqua, all of w. Oregon. The Skoton were divided into the Cow-nantico, Sacheriton, and Naalye. In 1875 (Ind. Aff. Rep., 177, 1875) they numbered 36 on Grande Ronde res. and 166 on Siletz res. See Chasta-Skoton.

Sconta.—Parker, Jour., 257, 1840. Scotons.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 219, 1856.

Skowl. Given by Petroff (10th Census, Alaska, 32, 1884) as the name of a town near Kasaan, Alaska. The word is undoubtedly a corruption of Sqa'oal, the name of a chief of Kasaan. If any place was so named, it was probably a small summer town or camp. (J. R. S.)

Skowtous. A division of the Ntlakypamuk in the neighborhood of Nicola lake, Brit. Col.—Mayné, Brit. Col., 113, 1862.

Sktahlejum. A division of Salish, sometimes rated as a subdivision of the Snohomish, on the upper waters of Snohomish r., Wash.

Sk-tah-le-gum.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 436, 1855. Sk-tah-le-jum.—Stevens in Ind. Aff. Rep., 458, 1854. Sk-tah-le-jum.—U. S. Ind. Treaties, 378, 1873. Skuok-stan-a-jumps.—Starling in Ind. Aff. Rep., 170, 1852. Stak-ta-le-jabah.—Mallet, ibid., 198, 1877.

Sktehl-mish. A division of Salish on Dwamish lake and r., Wash.

Skudus (Sk!ū'das, a word used when one misses a thing by arriving too late). A Haida town of the Djignaahl-lanas family on the N. side of Lyell id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 278, 1905.

Skuhamen (Squhā'mēn). A village of the Siyita tribe of Cowichan, at Agassiz, on lower Fraser r., Brit. Col.—Boas in 19th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 454, 1894.

Skuingkung (Squi'ñquñ). A Songish band at Victoria, Brit. Col.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 17, 1890.

Skukskhat (Skukrat, 'sucker mouth'). A former village of the Tlakluit below The Dalles of Columbia r., Wash. (E. S.)

Skull. See Anatomy.

Skulteen. A body of Salish of Fraser River agency, Brit. Col. Pop. 122 in 1896, the last time the name appears.

Skumeme (Skū-mē'-me). A former village of the Tututni on the S. side of Rogue r., Oreg., at its mouth.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 236, 1890.

Skumin (Sk-ūmī'n, 'keekwilee-house,' the term keekwilee meaning 'low,' or 'under,' probably referring to the semi-subterranean houses of the N. W. interior.) A Squawmish village community on the left bank of Squawmisht r., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Skunk. (1) The common name of a member of American musteloid carnivorous mammals (Mephitis mephitis), first appearing in English in the 17th century. The earliest citation is by Wood in his New England's Prospect (1634). This author, as well as Josselyn (1638-63), uses the form squnck, which Trumbull (Natick Dict., 155, 1903) connects with the Abnaki ségankw. The Cree sikák, the Chippewa shikāg, etc., are cognate Algonquian words. The word came into English from Abnaki (Kennebec), in which the second syllable is nasalized. (2) Any other species of the genus Mephitis, and, by extension, any species of the genera Spilogale and Conepatus. After the skunk have been named skunk-bear (the wolverene), skunk blackbird or skunk-bird (the bobolink), skunk-bill (the surf-scooter), skunk-cabbage or skunkweed (Symplocarpus foetidus; see Skoke), skunk-head or skunktop (pied duck, or the surf-scooter), skunk-porpoise (Lagenorhynchus acutus), skunk-spruce (Picea canadensis), skunkery or skunk-farm (a place where skunks are kept or bred for profit). (3) Among derived meanings are: "a vile, mean, good-for-nothing, or low-down fellow," the corresponding adjective being skunky or skunkish. Also there is the verb to skunk, having the senses: (a) to defeat utterly, without the other party scoring at all; (b) to get no votes in an election; (c) to leave without paying one's bills. Sea-skunk is a term which is applied to a certain type of motor-boats. (A. F. C. W. R. G.)

Skunk-cabbage. See Skoke.

Skurghut (Sku'-rrūt). A band or village of the Chastacosta on the N. side of Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 234, 1893.

Skurshka. The Water-snake clan of the pueblo of Laguna, N. Mex. Its members claim to have come originally from Sia. The clan forms a phratry with the Sqowi (Rattlesnake), Hatsi (Earth), and Meyo (Lizard) clans. (F. W. H.)

Shū'rahka-hānoch.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 352, 1896 (misprint sh for sk; hānoch = 'people').

Skutukson (Sk-u'tuksēn, 'promontory'). A Squawmish village community on the E. side of Howe sd., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Skuzis ('jumping'). A Ntlakyapamuk village on Fraser r. above Spuzzum, Brit. Col.; pop. 33 in 1901, the last time the name appears.

Skwah.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. 2, 160, 1901. Squah.—Ibid., 74, 1878. Squah-tta.—Gibbs, MS. vocab., B. A. E.

Skwahladas (Sqōā'ladas). A Haida family of the Raven clan, living on the W. coast of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. The meaning of the name is uncertain, but it has been suggested that it may indicate that they were successful fishermen. This family generally lived with the Ilgahetgu-lanas, but at one time had independent towns opposite Hippa id. and in Rennell sd. There part of them came to be known as Nasto-kegawai. Originally they seem to have formed one family with the Djahui-skwahladagai. (J. R. S.)

Slank. A word said to be of Indian origin, but of doubtful etymology, defined by Nelson (Inds. of N. J., 129, 1894) as "a name applied in the neighborhood of Paterson to a small body of water setting back like a bay along the shores of a river."

Slate. This material, which is widely diversified in character, was in very general use by the tribes n. of Mexico for the manufacture of utensils, implements, ornaments, and carvings in general. The typical slates are characterized by their laminated structure, and these were used to some extent, especially for implements; but the more massive varieties, such as the greenish striped slates of the Eastern states, the argillite (q. v.) of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the states to the s., and the black slate of the N. W. coast, were usually preferred. Argillite was much used by the tribes of the Delaware and Susquehanna valleys, and an ancient quarry of this material, located at Point Pleasant, Pa., has been described by Mercer (see Quarries). Material from this and corresponding quarries was used mainly for flaked implements, including leaf-shaped blades, knives, and arrow heads and spear heads, and these are widely distributed over the middle Atlantic states. The fine-grained greenish and striped slates of the Eastern and Middle states and Canada were extensively employed in the manufacture of several varieties of objects of somewhat problematic use, including banner stones, bird-shaped stones, and perforated and sculptured tablets. It is probable that, like the green agates and jadeites of Mexico, some varieties of this stone had special significance with the native tribes. The tribes of the N. W. coast employ a fine-grained black slate in their very artistic carvings, which the Haida obtain chiefly from deposits on Slate cr., Queen Charlotte ids. This slate has the desirable quality of being soft and easily carved when freshly quarried, and of growing harder with time. It is black and takes an excellent polish. See Sculpture, Totem-poles.

References to the use of slate occur in many works relating to ethnology and archeology, but are not sufficiently important to be given in full. Worthy of special mention are Mercer in Pub. Univ. Penn., VI, 1897; Niblack in Nat. Mus. Rep. 1888, 1890; Squier and Davis, Ancient Monuments, 1848. (W. H. H.)

Slavery. It may be doubted whether slavery, though so widespread as to have been almost universal, existed anywhere among very primitive peoples, since society must reach a certain state of organization before it can find lodgment (see Social organization). It appears, however, among peoples whose status is far below that of civilization.

Among the Eskimo, slavery appears to have been wholly unknown, although in the part of Alaska immediately n. of the Tlingit, where the Eskimo borrowed much of Indian culture and arts, it is possible that it existed in some form, as Bancroft affirms. Dall discovered no traces of slavery in Alaska, and doubts if it ever existed there. If the institution ever gained a foothold among the Eskimo it was foreign to their own culture and habits, was of comparatively recent introduction, and was practised only in a much modified form.

Beginning with the Tlingit, slavery as an institution existed among all the N. W. coast Indians as far as California. It practically ceased with s. Oregon, although the Hupa, of Athapascan stock, and the Nozi (Yanan), both of n. California, practised it to some extent, according to Powers. Among the former, a bastard became the slave for life of one of the male relatives of the mother and was compelled to perform menial service; nor could he or she marry a free person. Such slaves seem to have been entitled to purchase freedom, provided they could accumulate sufficient wealth. Both the Klamath and the Modoc seem to have had slavery in some form. The Klamath word for slave is lugsh, from luktha, 'to carry a load,' indicating that the slaves were the carriers of the tribe (Gatschet). The institution had found its way up Columbia r. also, at least as far as Wallawalla r., where it was known to the Cayuse of Waiilatpuan, and to the Nez Percés of Shahaptian stock. From the W. coast it appears to have passed far into the interior, where it was practised, probably in a much modified form, by the Indians of the Mackenzie r. region. It is said that the Etchareottine were called Awokànuk, 'slaves', by their Cree neighbors, an epithet which in its French and Indian forms came to be the name (Slave or Slavey) under which they are best known.

The N. W. region, embracing the islands and coast occupied by the Tlingit and Haida, and the Chimmesyan, Chinookan, Wakashan, and Salishan tribes, formed the stronghold of the institution. As we pass to the eastward the practice of slavery becomes modified, and finally its place is taken by a very different custom. Among the tribes mentioned, slavery seems to have existed long enough to have secured a prominent place in mythology and to have materially modified the habits and institutions of the people. It was no doubt the origin of ideas of caste and rank widespread among tribes of the N. W. coast, but comparatively unknown elsewhere among our Indians. It varied considerably among different tribes, the most essential characteristics, however, being similar, as was the general mode of life of the peoples practising it. The above-named were fishing tribes and expert canoe-men, depending for food far more on the products of sea fisheries than on game. All lived in settled villages. With all, the essential condition of rank and position was wealth, not renown gained in war. The slaves consisted of prisoners taken from neighboring tribes, chiefly women and children; and, among most tribes, of their descendants. Over most of the area in question there appears to have been a regular traffic in slaves, the source of a considerable part of the private wealth. Jewett states in his Narrative (1815) that a Nootka chief had in his house "nearly fifty male and female slaves, no other chief having more than twelve." Simpson estimated that slaves formed one-third of the population of the Tlingit. The price of an adult slave was about $500 in blankets; of a child, 50 blankets, about $150.

Servitude in the N. W. appears to have been of a rather mild type. Slaves, as a rule, were well fed and well treated, as was natural with valuable property. The condition of the bondman indeed seems generally to have been little inferior to that of his master, whom he assisted in paddling, fishing, and hunting, even in making war on neighboring tribes. Expeditions were often undertaken for the primary purpose of slave catching. The slaves made or helped make canoes, cut wood, carried water, aided in building houses, etc. Enslaved women and children were household drudges, performing the laborious and menial tasks which elsewhere fell to the lot of free women. The distinction between the slave and the free man was especially sharply drawn in all ceremonial practices, from which slaves were rigidly excluded, and generally also with regard to marriage, for the slave usually could not mate with a free man or woman, though the Makah men, Swan asserts, frequently married female slaves. The male offspring of such marriages seem to have occupied an equivocal position between free men and slaves. Slaves seem to have had no well-defined rights; they could not own property and were subject to the caprices of their owners, who had power of life and death over them. Among the Tlingit it was customary to kill slaves and to bury their bodies beneath the corner-posts of the chiefs' houses at the time when they were erected; but this does not appear to have been done by the Haida. At other times they were given away or freed to show that their owner was so wealthy he could easily afford to part with them. Swan states that when a chief died among the Makah his favorite slaves were killed and buried with him.

Punishment for shortcomings was sometimes severe, the owner of a slave being responsible to no one. Occasionally slaves were killed outright in moments of passion.

Investigation of slavery among the tribes of the Great Plains and the Atlantic slope is difficult. Scattered through early histories are references to the subject, but such accounts are usually devoid of details, and the context often proves them to be based on erroneous conceptions. Had slavery existed among the Eastern and Southern tribes, we should find in the mass of documentary history as full accounts of the practice as there is concerning the less-known tribes of the N. W. coast. The unsatisfactory character of the references should make us cautious in accepting statements regarding the existence of slavery. The early French and Spanish histories, it is true, abound in allusions to Indian slaves, even specifying the tribes from which they were taken, but the terms "slave" and "prisoner" were used interchangeably in almost every such instance. Hennepin, in his account of his own captivity among the Sioux, uses these terms as equivalent, and speaks of himself as a slave, though his story clearly shows that he had been adopted by an old chief in the place of a lost son. With the exception of the area above mentioned, traces of true slavery are wanting throughout the region N. of Mexico. In its place is found another institution that has often been mistaken for it. Among the North American Indians a state of periodic intertribal warfare seems to have existed. Disputes as to the possession of land, retaliation for acts of violence, and blood revenge were the alleged causes; but underlying all was the fierce martial spirit of the Indian which ever spurred him from inglorious peace to stirring deeds of war. In consequence of such warfare tribes dwindled through the loss of men, women, and children killed or taken captive. Natural increase was not sufficient to make good such losses; for while Indian women were prolific, the loss of children by disease, especially in early infancy, was very great. Hence arose the institution of adoption. Men, women, and children, especially the latter two classes, were everywhere considered spoils of war. When a sufficient number of prisoners had been tortured and killed to glut the savage passions of the conquerors, the rest of the captives were adopted, after certain preliminaries, into the several gentes, each newly adopted member taking the place of a lost husband, wife, son, or daughter, and being invested with the latter's rights, privileges, and duties. It sometimes happened that small parties went out for the avowed purpose of taking captives to be adopted in the place of deceased members of families. John Tanner, a white boy thus captured and adopted by the Chippewa, wrote a narrative of his Indian life that is a mine of valuable and interesting information. Adoption occasionally took place on a large scale, as, for instance, when the Tuscarora and the Tutelo, on motion of their sponsors in the federal council, were formally adopted as offspring by the Oneida, the Delawares as cooks (an honorable position) by the Mohawk, and the Nanticoke, as offspring by the Seneca. In this way these alien tribes acquired citizenship in the Iroquois League; they were said to be "braces" to the "Extended Cabin," the name by which the Iroquois designated their commonwealth. (See Adoption, Captives).

Nor is it impossible that slaveholding tribes might have substituted adoption. Indications of the manner in which such change might have been effected may be found among the Tlingit and other N. W. Coast tribes, who not only freed their slaves on occasions, but made them members of the tribe. They also sometimes married slaves, which was tantamount to adoption. Wherever slavery did not exist, adoption seems to have been universally practised. Except that prisoners of war were necessary to recruit both institutions, the two are very unlike. The slave of the N. W. coast held absolutely no status within the tribe, whether he came into possession of the individual as the result of war or was bought as a slave from a neighboring tribe. Whatever privileges were his were granted as a favor, not as a right. On the other hand, the adopted person was in every respect the peer of his fellow-tribesmen. If he proved equal to the position assigned him in the tribe, and improved his opportunities, his advancement was sure, and he might aspire to any office attainable by the individual into whose place he had been adopted. If the new member of the tribe proved a poor hunter, a poor provider, or, above all, if he lacked courage, his position was not enviable: he was despised, and treated according to his demerits, probably worse than if he had been born a member of the tribe. Still there was nothing in his position or treatment to justify the statement that he was a slave, and his ignominy and shame were probably not greater than were usually incurred by the poor and worthless. It was the usual custom to depose the coward from man's estate, and, in native metaphor, to "make a woman" of him. Such persons associated ever after with the women and aided them in their tasks. Such was the custom among the Pawnee, as recorded by Grinnell (Pawnee Hero Stories, 26, 1893), who also gives a still more curious custom, by which young men who had not attained any special standing in the tribe lived as servants in the families of men of position and influence, and performed many offices almost menial. Dunbar speaks of these servants as being parasites and as usually being the most worthless members of the tribes (Pawnee Indians, 1880).

In most tribes polygamy was permitted, and it was a common practice for men to take to wife female captives. As a legal wife such a woman was entitled to the same privileges as her married sisters in the tribe, but her actual treatment depended largely upon her capacities and her personal popularity. When she was introduced into a family where there already were several wives, jealousy was easily aroused, and the new wife was likely to be abused and driven to menial tasks. No doubt such women were often assumed to be slaves by the casual observer.

European influence materially modified almost every art and practice of the Indian. No sooner had the border wars begun than the natives discovered a higher value for the white prisoners of war than adoption. Although white men and children were adopted into Indian tribes and lived and died with them, the ransom offered in ready money, in whisky, or in powder and guns changed the status of the white captive. He was very generally held in captivity for ransom, or taken to the French, English, or Spanish, according to his nativity, and disposed of for a cash payment. Cases were not rare in which white captives were redeemed and sent back to their friends even after formal adoption into a tribe. The practice of redeeming captives was favored by the missionaries and settlers with a view of mitigating the hardships of Indian warfare. The spread of Indian slavery among the tribes of the central region was due in part to the efforts of the French missionaries to induce their red allies to substitute a mild condition of servitude for their accustomed practice of indiscriminate massacre, torture, and cannibalism (see Dunn, Indiana, 1905). During the interval between his captivity and redemption, usually lasting months, occasionally several years, the white captive, unless adopted, was made to do menial tasks, and his lot was hard. The white prisoner, indeed, unless very young, rarely proved satisfactory as an adopted member of the tribe. He did not often take kindly to Indian life, was quick to seize an opportunity to escape, and was always welcomed back by his friends, whereas in the case of the Indian, adoption severed all former social and tribal ties. The adopted Indian warrior was forever debarred from returning to his own people, by whom he would not have been received. His fate was thenceforth inextricably interwoven with that of his new kinsmen.

The Southeastern Indians—Cherokee,

Creeks, Choctaw, and Chickasaw—soon after the settlement of the country by Europeans came into possession of runaway negro slaves. The Indians were quick to perceive their value as servants, and we soon find them buying and selling black slaves. There is nothing to show that this introduction of black slaves among the Muskogean tribes and others materially changed the status of the Indian prisoner of war. The Seminole of Florida married many negro runaways, whose position seems to have been in all respects like that of other members of the tribe. There were, indeed, among the Seminole several settlements of runaway negro slaves who had their own chiefs and seem to have been a recognized part of the tribe.

Europeans made a practice of enslaving or selling into slavery captive Indians. Carolina was early made by the Spaniards a hunting ground for Indian slaves, who were deported to Cuba. Numbers of the male children of the conquered Pequot were transported to the West Indies from Massachusetts and sold into slavery, while the women and girls were scattered among white families (Bradford in Coll. Mass. Hist. Soc., III, 360, 1856). The English settlers of South Carolina practised the enslavement of Indians on a large scale, and during the years 1702–1708 sent out three expeditions against the Yamasee, Apalachee, and Timucua, of N. Florida. They carried back to Charleston almost the entire population of 7 large towns, in all, some 1,400 persons, who were sold as slaves to the Carolina settlers or distributed among the Creeks, who assisted in the enterprise. Indeed, in the early days of the colonies the enslavement of Indians by settlers seems to have been general. See Adoption, Social Organization. (H. W. H.)

Slaves. An ethnic and linguistic Athapascan group comprising, according to Petitot (Dict. Dènè Dindjié, xx, 1876), the Etchareottine, Thlingchadinne, and Kawchodinne. He included also the Ettagottine of the Nahane group. The Etchareottine are specifically designated by this term, which originated with the Cree, who captured them in forays, and the tribe nearest to the Cree, the Etchaotine, are called Slaves proper.

Sleds. The Eskimo and the Indians N. of lat. 40° used as a vehicle for travel and transportation, complementary to the skin boat and the bark canoe, the sled drawn by man and dog over snow and ice. The Eskimo make long journeys, using boat and sled alternately. Sleds differ in construction, shape, and use according to the materials, the ingenuity of the people, the nature of the ice and snow, the journeys to be made, and the loads to be hauled. The simplest forms are smooth, flat substances, sometimes even blocks of ice; there is one consisting of a few plates of baleen stitched together; others are elaborately constructed. Uniform widths were adopted to enable them to follow the same tracks. Owing to frost and strain treenails and pegs were little used in construction; only lashings of good rawhide thongs would hold them together. In the use of these the makers were as ingenious at seizing and making knots as the Pacific islanders. The parts of a sled are the runners, shoes, crossbars, handles, lashings, lines, traces, toggles, packing, webbing, and braces. These belong to the fully equipped sled, which is a marvel of convenience, but some of them may be wanting. There are four plans of construction besides numerous makeshifts: (1) The bed lashed to solid runners; (2) the bed on pairs of bent sticks spliced together or arched and fastened below to runners; (3) the bed resting on a square mortised frame, probably an introduced type; (4) the bed flat on the ground, the toboggan. In the E., the Eskimo, being in some places poorly provided with wood, made sled runners of porous bone, pieces of which, cut to shape and pierced, were sewed together neatly. The shoeing consisted of short strips of ivory or smooth bone, pierced and fastened on with treenails or thongs, which were countersunk to prevent abrading. When in use the shoes and runners were coated with ice or often with blood and salt. Boas figures a complete sled from Cumberland gulf, and Mason a much pieced and perforated runner from Greenland, brought by Dr Kane. In the Mackenzie r. district were brought together the riding and freighting toboggan, the framed sleds of the Kutchin, and varieties with solid wooden runners. The greatest variety of forms, figured and described by Murdoch and Nelson, were found in Alaska. The main types are the low, flat sled without a rail, for carrying bulky objects and umiaks, and the built-up sled with a high rail on each side for loads of smaller articles and camp equipage. Murdoch describes a shoe of ice, 1 ft high and 6 in. wide, placed by the Pt Barrow Eskimo on the runners. Nelson figures the details of the two types of sled about Bering str., together with the whip, breast-board, swivels, and line attachments.

Sleeping Wolf (proper name Gai-k'ati, 'Wolf lying down'). Second chief of the Kiowa, a delegate to Washington in 1872, and a prominent leader in the outbreak of 1874-75. He was shot and killed in a quarrel with one of his own tribe in 1877. The name is hereditary in the tribe and has been borne by at least 5 successive individuals, the first of whom negotiated the permanent peace between the Kiowa and Comanche about 1790. (J. M.)

Sleepy Eyes (Ishtaba, or Ishtahumba). A chief of the Lower Sisseton Sioux, of the Chanslachikana band (not a Teton, as is sometimes said), born on Minnesota r. near the present site of Mankato; he lived most of his years on the lake which bears his name in Brown co., Minn. He was prominent in the affairs of his tribe contemporary with the relinquishment of their lands in Minnesota and the removal to the reservations on the upper Minnesota from 1850 to 1865. Sleepy Eyes became chief between 1822 and 1825, evidently succeeding Waukanto. He was a frequent and friendly visitor at the home of Rev S. R. Riggs, the renowned missionary. Heard states that a party of his people participated in the massacre of the whites at the Lake Shetek settlement in 1862. He is described in 1836 (McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, II, 109, 1854) as large and well proportioned, of rather dignified appearance, good natured and plausible, but as having never been distinguished as a warrior or hunter. He signed the treaties of Prairie du Chien, Aug. 19, 1825, and July 15, 1830; St. Peters, Nov. 30, 1836; and Traverse des Sioux, July 23, 1851. The last treaty was signed also by "Sleepy Eyes young," probably a son. Sleepy Eyes died in Roberts co., S. Dak., but many years after his death his remains were disinterred and removed to Sleepyeye, Minn., where they were reburied under a monument erected by the citizens. (D. R. C. T.)

Slings. Slings made of the skins of animals and of textile materials variously woven and plaited were in use among the ancient aborigines of Middle and South America, and are still employed by the more primitive tribes. There appears to be no absolute proof, however, that the sling was known to the northern tribes before the discovery of America, although it has been assumed that certain pellets of baked clay found in numbers in California mounds were intended for this use. The slings found in collections, although showing in their materials and manufacture some local tribal characteristics, were adopted from Europeans and had no employment other than for youthful sports. Smith, Nimrod Jarrett (known to his people as Tsálātihī, an attempt at the sound of "Jarrett"). A mixed-blood Cherokee, for a number of years chief of the Eastern band, residing on a reservation in W. North Carolina. His father, Henry Smith, was a half-breed, while his mother was of full blood. Chief Smith was born on Valley r., near the present Murphy, N. C., about 1838. He received a fair education, which he supplemented from his own resources in later years. Shortly after the outbreak of the Civil War he enlisted, with a considerable number of the East Cherokee, in the Thomas Confederate Legion, organized by Col. W. H. Thomas, a Cherokee trader, and served to the close of the war as sergeant of his Indian company. Some 10 years later he was elected principal chief of the Eastern band, which office he held by successive reelections almost to the time of his death. During all these years he was an active worker on behalf of his people, both at home and in Washington, and always at great personal sacrifice to himself, as by reason of the refusal of the band to join the main body of the tribe in the W. they were denied any share in the tribal funds, so that most of his service was performed at his own expense. Through his efforts the first schools were established among the East Cherokee and the landed interests of the tribe were established on a secure basis. He died in Aug. 1893. In person Smith was of manly and lovable disposition, dignified bearing, and magnificent physique, being 6 ft 4 in. in height. He was a master of both Cherokee and English. His wife was a white woman, formerly Miss Mary Guthrie. (J. M.)

Smoen (Smō'en). The highest gens or band of the Bellacoola people of Nuttel, Brit. Col.—Boas in 7th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 6, 1891.

Smohalla. An Indian prophet and teacher, the originator of a religion current among the tribes of the upper Columbia r. and adjacent region in Washington, Oregon, and Idaho, whence the name "Smohallah Indians" sometimes applied. The name, properly Shmoqūla, signifies "The Preacher," and was given to him after he became prominent as a religious reformer. He belonged to the Sokulk, a small tribe cognate to the Nez Percés and centering about Priest rapids on the Columbia in B. Washington. He was born about 1815 or 1820, and in his boyhood frequented a neighboring Catholic mission, from which he evidently derived some of his ceremonial ideas. He distinguished himself as a warrior, and began to preach about the year 1850. Somewhat later, in consequence of a quarrel with a rival chief, he left home secretly and absented himself for a long time, wandering as far s. as Mexico and returning overland through Nevada to the Columbia. On being questioned he declared that he had been to the spirit world and had been sent back to deliver a message to the Indian race. This message, like that of other aboriginal prophets, was, briefly, that the Indians must return to their primitive mode of life, refuse the teachings or the things of the white man, and in all their actions be guided by the will of the Indian God as revealed in dreams to Smohalla and his priests. The doctrine found many adherents, Chief Joseph and his Nez Percés being among the most devoted believers. Smohalla has recently died, but, in spite of occasional friction with agency officials, the "Dreamers," as they are popularly called, maintain their religious organization, with periodical gatherings and an elaborate ceremony. See Mooney, Ghost Dance Religion, 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896. (J. M.)

Smoking. For more than a century after the discovery of America nearly all the early voyagers remarked on a curious practice, described as "a fumigation of a peculiar kind," that they found prevailing in some form almost everywhere in North America. It is narrated that "the Spaniards were honored as though they had been deities." Cortés is reported to have been received with incense, and it was said by one chronicler that he was "met by persons carrying vessels with lighted coals to fumigate him." The natives were said to burn incense to or to fumigate their idols, and the priests to "prepare themselves by smoking to receive the devil's oracles." These and many similar expressions indicate that the practice of smoking was not understood by Europeans. The cigar or the cigarette was used throughout Spanish America. Montezuma and other chiefs of Mexico were said "to compose themselves to sleep by smoking." Alarcon, in 1540, found the natives on the lower Colorado using "small reeds for making perfume," likening them to "the Indian tabagos of New Spain." Jacques Cartier found the practice of smoking to prevail on the lower St. Lawrence. Champlain refers to the native assemblies as tabagies. Harriot says the natives took the fumes of smoke as a cure for disease, and that they knew nothing of many ailments "wherewith we in England are oftentimes afflicted." Tobacco or some mixture thereof was invariably smoked in councils with the whites and on other solemn occasions.

CEREMONIAL SMOKING; PAWNEE (G. A. DORSEY)

No important undertaking was entered upon without deliberation and discussion in a solemn council at which the pipe was smoked by all present. The remarkable similarity in smoking customs throughout the continent proves the great antiquity of the practice. The custom of offering incense was not restricted to men, for women also, in certain localities, are said to have offered incense to idols. It was not necessarily a religious act; it was observed as a compliment to "lords and ambassadors." The women of Cartagena, we are told, about 1750, could offer no higher courtesy to a person than to light his tobacco for him. The Hopi, in their ceremonies, offer smoke to their sacred images, and the ceremonies of the pipe are observed with great decorum; the head chief is attended by an assistant of nearly equal rank, who ceremoniously lights the pipe, and with certain formalities and set words hands it to the chief, who blows the smoke to the world-quarters and over the altar as a preliminary to his invocation. In religious ceremonies in general the priest usually blows the smoke over the altar to the world-quarters. In the councils of some tribes the pipe was handed to the head chief by the official pipe keeper; after lighting it he handed it on, and it was passed around in the council house, usually from left to right, until each one had smoked and thus fitted himself for serious deliberation. Among some tribes the pipe, in being passed from one individual to another during a ceremony, is differently grasped and held, according to the nature of the ceremony or to the taboo obligation of the individual. Among other tribes the decoration of pipes, and especially of the pipe stems, has great ceremonial and ethnic significance; even the attachment holding the pipe to the stem is fixed with special care, and the early death of an individual, or other calamity, it was believed, would ensue were the pipe dropped from the stem during a ceremony. Every individual engaging in war, hunting, fishing, or husbandry, and every clan and phratry made supplication to the gods by means of smoke, which was believed to bring good and to arrest evil, to give protection from enemies, to bring game or fish, allay storms, and protect one while journeying.

Smoking was early introduced from America into Europe and spread to the most distant parts of the world with astonishing rapidity until it encircled the globe, returning to America by way of Asia. It should be said, however, that the act of inhaling and exhaling smoke through a tube for medicinal purposes was certainly known to the ancients in Europe and Asia from a time antedating the Christian era. The fear that smoking would cause degeneration of the race or affect injuriously the revenues of the government caused stringent edicts to be passed against the use of tobacco, the violation of which was punished sometimes with death.

See Pipes, Tobacco, and the authorities thereunder cited. (J. D. M.)

Smutty Bear. A head-man of the Yankton Sioux, who first appears as a signer of the treaty of Portage des Sioux in 1815. He signed also the trade and intercourse treaty at Ft. Kiowa in 1825, and the treaty relinquishing title to the Yankton lands in 1858. Soon after, however, he led a strong faction of his tribe in hostility to the treaty, but was out-manuevered by his contemporary chief, Struck-by-the-Ree. After the removal of the tribe to their reservation near Ft. Randall, S. Dak., in 1859, Smutty Bear, then very old, lost his influence and soon died. (D. R.)

Snake dance. A noteworthy ceremony of the Hopi Indians of Arizona, in which live snakes are carried. It is held every 2 years, alternating with the Flute ceremony, in the Hopi pueblos of Walpi, Mishongnovi, Shipaulovi, Shumopovi, and Oraibi, by the Snake and Antelope fraternities conjointly about Aug. 20. Each fraternity meets in separate underground kivas, and each holds a public "dance" at the conclusion of certain secret rites conducted during the preceding 8 days. The striking features of the complicated secret rite are the gathering of snakes from the world-quarters, the making of the sand altar, the snake washing, the snake drama, and the races which occur on the mornings of the days of the public "dance" of the Snake fraternity. In the afternoon the Antelope celebrants file from their kiva, painted and attired in the traditional costume consisting of headdress, necklace, bandolier, armlets, kilt, anklets, moccasins, and a tortoise-shell rattle bound to the knee, and march to the plaza, about which they circle four times, each man stamping on a small board set in the ground in notification to the beings of the underworld that a ceremony is going on. They then form in line on each side of a small shelter of cottonwood boughs, called a kisi, erected at the margin of the plaza, and sound their rattles. The Snake priests follow in the same order and form in line, facing the Antelope priests. A low chant begins, gradually intensifying in volume; the lines sway in undulating curves, the motion increases with the chant until the movement culminates in a dance-like restrained leap. The snake dancers at once form in groups of three and dance with a hopping step until they arrive before the kai where the snakes and snake passer are concealed. The carrier drops to his knees and receives a snake, grasps it by the middle in his mouth, and, rising, dances four times around the plaza, when he drops the snake, which is immediately picked up by the collector. The carrier then returns to the kai, obtains another snake, and goes through the same process. The carrier is assisted by a companion, who passes one hand over his shoulder and waves before the snake, with the other hand, a snake whip, consisting of a short staff to which are attached two eagle feathers: this is for the purpose of causing the snakes to uncoil and run, when they are picked up with great celerity. While the dance is progressing a group of women and maidens in picturesque costume stand at one side of the plaza and sprinkle the dancers with sacred meal from basket trays.

When the snakes have all been carried, the participants pause while a "six-directions picture" in sacred corn-meal is drawn on the ground. At a signal the collectors throw the snakes on the meal; then a wild scramble ensues, and one by one the priests emerge with snakes in their hands and rush down the rocky trail of the mesa to release the reptiles at various points below the pueblo. Returning, the priests are given an emetic drink, made from herbs, and undergo a thorough purification. The ceremony closes with feasting and games by the entire populace.

The Snake dance is celebrated principally as a prayer for rain. The legend as to its origin recounts that the children of the union of the Snake Hero and the Snake Maid were transformed into snakes, hence snakes are regarded by the Hopi as their elder brothers and are thought to be powerful in compelling the nature gods to bring rain. For this purpose they are set free at the close of the ceremony. The snake rite is thought to have been originally an observance of the ancient Snakeclan, which furnishes the chief of the society. The ceremony is believed to represent an agreement between the Snake and Antelope clans to hold joint celebration of their respective rites, which no doubt conflicted when the clans originally came to live together. Some rivalry is still observable in connection with the assumed efficiency of the rain charms of the two societies. Two species of rattlesnake and the bull and the whip snake are carried in the dance. The latter two are not venomous. The celebrants are rarely bitten by the dangerous snakes, a fact due largely to careful handling and to the "herding" to which the snakes have been subjected between the time when they are gathered and the dance. The Snake dance formerly must have been widely distributed among the Pueblo tribes, as remnants of it are found at Zuñi, Laguna, Acoma, Sia, and Cochiti, and among other Rio Grande villages. That it was practised in Mexico is evidenced by a picture in Sahagún's Historia. The Yokuts of California held a rattlesnake ceremony, Tutulums, which from Powers' description (Cont. N. A. Ethnol.,

HOPÍ SNAKE PRIEST (SANTA FE RAILWAY)

Snowshoes. Devices worn on the feet to enable the Eskimo and the Indian to walk over snow and very soft ground in hunting, pulling sleds, driving dog teams, and gathering food. The parts of a snowshoe are the wooden rim, toe and heel crossbar of wood or rawhide, extra strengthening bars, foot netting in large meshes with a stout thong for the foot to rest upon, toe and heel netting closely meshed with babiche or twisted sinew, which, however, is not always present, and foot lines for attaching the shoe. The size of the mesh varies, a coarser mesh being used for wet, soft snow. Snowshoes differ in materials, form, fineness, and decoration from place to place and from tribe to tribe. Wooden skis, such as were used in the Eastern continent, were absent, though Turner found the Indians of Whale r., Labrador, wearing shoes of thin spruce board, and the toboggan of Canada is a double ski for freight or passenger. Snowshoes vary greatly in shape, being round, elliptical, pointed oval, pointed at both ends, or irregular. The toe may be flat or upturned; the heel rounded, pointed, or widened into a trailer. The best examples are made in rights and lefts. The separate forms so differ locally that they almost equal in number the tribes wearing them. This can be shown best by figures (see Dall, Dixon, Mason, Murdoch, Nelson, and Turner). Especial attention is paid to the footing and foot lines. The netting under the foot is arranged with a view to the greatest comfort, the ball of the foot being firmly supported and the toes having free play. In putting on the shoe the hands are not used, the foot being thrust into the ankle loop fastened at a right angle to the frame, after which, by a dexterous twist, the toe is thrust under its loop. The snowshoer walks with a long, swinging stride, lifting the toe and letting the tail or heel drag. Among the eastern Eskimo, who live outside of the tree zone, the snowshoe is very crude; the frames are small, made sometimes of bone, and the webbing is very coarse, but in the W. there is greater variety between the coarse and the finer types. The rim consists of two willow stems, thickest in the middle, elliptical in section, the long axis being vertical, and keeled on the inner face, except between the toe and heel bars. These stems are joined in front by a long lappet held together by stitching with thong. At the heel the ends are prolonged into a slight tail and the ends sewed together. The method of putting on the netting is elaborate. The Athapascan tribes adjoining the western Eskimo inland use fine-meshed shoes with upturned toes. The Kutchin on Mackenzie r. wear a round upturned snowshoe of 3 sizes, the largest for moose hunting, one of half size, and the traveling shoe. South of them for an indefinite distance, even into N. United States, was found the pointed elliptical type. Farther S. were used flat shoes with square fronts, having trailers; and in Labrador flat shoes of immense size and width, with round beaver-tail and swallow-tail heels (Turner). In the Pacific states the simplest forms prevailed as far S. as N. California. The rim was round or slightly oval, flat, and not always regular; toe and heel bars were replaced with stout rawhide rope, and netting was of the simplest kind. These approximate most closely to the eastern Asiatic forms. The foot lacing in some binds closely down both toe and heel. With the snowshoe in Alaska goes a staff, having a spike and a little snowshoe at the lower end.

Soacatino. A district visited by the troops of Moscoso, of the De Soto expedition, in 1542. It lay w. of Mississippi r., bordering on the Eyeish and Anadarko, probably near the middle course of Red r. The Spaniards expected to find a large and rich province, but it was a thick forest, where the people lacked food; hence they abandoned the hope of reaching Mexico by land and returned to the Mississippi. The natives evidently belonged to the Caddoan family. Cf. Doustioni.

Sobaipuri. A Piman tribe formerly inhabiting the main and tributary valleys of San Pedro and Santa Cruz rs., between lon. 110° and 111°, and the Rio Gila between the mouth of the San Pedro r. and the ruins of Casa Grande, and possibly eastward of this area in s. Arizona. Missions were established among them by the Spaniards in the latter part of the 17th and beginning of the 18th centuries at Guevavi, Suameca, and San Xavier del Bac, to which numerous visitas were attached. According to Bourke "the Apaches have among them the Tze-kinne, or Stone-house people, descendants of the cliff-dwelling Sobaypuris, whom they drove out of Aravypa cañon and forced to flee to the Pimas for refuge about a century ago" (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, 114, Apr.-June 1890); and Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, iii, 102, 1890) states that "the Apaches caused the Sobaypuris to give up their homes on the San Pedro and to merge into the Pápagos." It would seem, therefore, that the extinction of the Sobaipuri as a tribe was due to depredations by the Apache and that their remnant was absorbed by the Papago, their western neighbors, of whom indeed they may have been but a part. In later years the Papago occupied at least one of the former Sobaipuri towns—San Xavier del Bac.

Former settlements ascribed to the Sobaipuri are: Alamos, Aribaiha, Babisi, Baicadeat, Busac, Camani, Causac, Comarsuta, Esqugbaag, Guevavi, Jaumalturgo(?), Social organization. North American tribes contained (1) subdivisions of a geographic or consanguineal character; (2) social and governmental classes or bodies, especially chiefs and councils, with particular powers and privileges; and (3) fraternities of a religious or semi-religious character, the last of which are especially treated under Secret societies.

Tribes may be divided broadly into those in which the organization was loose, the subdivisions being families or bands and descent being counted prevailingly in the male line, and those which were divided into clearly defined groups called gentes or clans, which were strictly exogamic. Among the former may be placed the Eskimo; the eastern branch of the northern Athapascans; the Cree, Montagnais, Nascapsee, Micmac, and Cheyenne, among the Algonquians; the northern Caddoan tribes; the Kiowa; most of the Shoshonean tribes; the Apache, and nearly all of the peoples of California, Oregon, Washington, s. Texas, and s. British Columbia; among the latter the Haida, Tlingit, Tsimshian, Heiltsuk, and western Athapascans; the Pueblos, Navaho, a few s. California tribes, and the majority of tribes in the Atlantic and Gulf states.

Where clans exist the distinctive character of each is very strongly defined, and a man can become a member only by birth, adoption, or transfer in infancy from his mother's to his father's clan, or vice versa. Each clan generally possessed some distinctive tutelary from which the majority of the persons belonging to it derived their names, certain rights, carvings, and ceremonies in common, and often the exclusive right to a tract of land.

Although the well-defined caste system of the N. Pacific coast, based on property and the institution of slavery, does not seem to have had a parallel elsewhere N. of Mexico except perhaps among the Natchez, bravery in war, wisdom in council, oratorical, poetical, or artistic talents, real or supposed psychic powers—in short, any variety of excellence whatever served in all Indian tribes to give one prominence among his fellows, and it is not strange that popular recognition of a man's ability sometimes reacted to the benefit of his descendants. Although it was always a position of great consequence, leadership in war was generally separate from and secondary to the civil chieftainship. Civil leadership and ceremonial primacy were much more commonly combined. Among the Pueblos all three are united, forming a theocracy. Councils of a democratic, unconventional kind, in which wealthy persons or those of most use to the tribe had the greatest influence, were universal where no special form of council was established.

An Eskimo tribe consisted of those households that hunted or fished in the same geographical region and wintered in one village, or in several villages not far apart. Government was carried on by the heads of houses, and usually there was a headman in the tribe whose word had weight in matters connected with hunting and fishing. A class of helpers was composed of "bachelors without any relations, cripples who were not able to provide for themselves, or men who had lost their sledges and dogs" (Boas, Central Eskimo, 1888). A young man generally lived with his wife's family, much under their control, until the death of his parents-in-law. If he or his wife died meantime, their children remained with her people. When a man had once established his household independently, however, he was the head of it, and on his death his principal possessions went to the eldest of his sons, born to him or adopted, who had not an independent position. In so simple an organization as this we see the basis on which very important structures were elsewhere built. Nelson claims to have found traces of totemism among the Alaskan Eskimo, but it was probably imported from the Indians to the S. and does not appear to have taken deep root in the social life.

Among the more eastern Athapaskan tribes the social organization is said to have been of a similar loose, paternal type. The Paiute and some other Shoshonean tribes consisted of bands, each governed by a chief, which occupied and took their names from particular localities. There were also chiefs whose authority extended, probably in a very indefinite form, over a number of others.

Throughout California, except in one small area, subdivisions were also local, and descent was paternal, so far as it was distinguished at all. Hupa men, for instance, usually resided throughout life in the town where they were born, while the women went elsewhere to live with their husbands, the towns being in practice chiefly exogamic, though there was no recognized requirement of exogamy. A man more often married a woman from outside of his village than one born there, only because the chances were that the majority of women in his own village were his actual blood-relations. Headship among them depended on wealth, and might be lost with it. Amount of property also determined headship over the villages of an entire district when they united for war or for ceremonial observances. The Mohave also reckoned descent through the father, and there are indications of a nascent or decadent gentile system. Among the Hupa, Yurok, Karok, and other tribes of N. W. California slavery was a recognized institution, though the number of slaves was small.

The coast people of Oregon and Washington were organized on the basis of village communities similar to those of California, but slavery occupied a more prominent position in the social fabric and its importance increased northward, the institution extending as far, at least, as Copper River, Alaska (see Slavery). The Salish tribes of the interior of British Columbia consisted of many village communities, for the greater part independent of one another. Civil, military, and religious matters were each directed by different persons whose special fitness had been recognized, and though the succession usually passed from father to son, the actual selection rested with the people. In the selection of a civil chief, property was the determining factor. The few totemic devices or crests found in this region were inherited by all of the original owner's blood relations in both the male and female lines. A chief, like the noted Seattle, was sometimes found ruling over his mother's instead of his father's people, and a man was often known by a different name in his mother's town from that he bore in his father's.

Freemen among the coast Salish were divided into nobles, middle-class men, and servants. Below the last were the slaves captured in war. Servants were either poor relations of the better classes or members of formerly independent divisions reduced by war or otherwise to a servile condition, yet not actually enslaved. A chief might be displaced, but his office was usually hereditary from father to son, and it carried with it leadership in ceremonial matters, though not in war. According to Hill-Tout many of the larger Salish tribes recognized the paramount authority of one among the various local chiefs.

The Nootka tribes of the w. coast of Vancouver id. were subdivided into septs, or gentes, each possessing a single crest and ruled by a head chief. A council formed of these head chiefs determined the action of the tribe, and the chief of the sept that was highest in rank exercised some influence over the rest. Membership in the septs did not involve marriage prohibition, which was confined to real blood relationship, marriage within the sept being otherwise permissible. Chieftainships are said to have descended from father to son, but when persons of different septs married, the children belonged to the one higher in rank.

Although related by language to the Nootka, the Kwakiutl system differed considerably. Each division composing a Kwakiutl tribe was thought to be descended from an ancestor who had set up his house at a definite place, and it is probable that these divisions were originally local groups like those of the Salish, though some of them have now spread among several different tribes. Descent appears originally to have been paternal, but a man might obtain new crests and membership in a different gens for his son by marrying the daughter of another man who had them. This, however, may have been due to the influence of the more northern tribes having maternal descent.

The tribes possessing a well-defined clan system are divided into three groups—the North Pacific, Southwestern, and Eastern. All of the first group had two or more phratries, each named after some animal or bird and subdivided into a number of clans ruled over by chiefs. Unless there was a more powerful clan at the same place a family chief was also chief of his town. In some cases a clan was divided, having chiefs in different towns. The lowest unit was the house group, consisting of a family in the European sense, including remote relations together with servants and slaves over which ruled the house chief or householder. As among the tribes farther s., there were also low-caste groups, which formed a large part of the servant class. The principal power rested with the town chiefs, but depended on their ability to maintain their superiority in riches. A house chief might displace a family chief, and the chief of a different family could supplant a town chief.

The Pueblos had a large number of small clans, organized on a theocratic basis with special rituals and special leaders in the rituals, and in some pueblos, as Zuñi, Laguna, Acoma, and the Hopi villages, there existed also phratries. In some towns, at least, a man was not permitted to marry into either the clan of his mother or that of his father, but since the advent of missionaries, in consequence of the reduction in numbers which has taken place and as a result of their teachings, this law has been often set aside in recent years.

The Zuñi are divided into a large number of clans, and many offices are always filled with reference to these. A boy or a girl is regarded as belonging to the mother's clan, but is spoken of as a "child" of the father's clan, and marriage into either of these is practically prohibited. Land, along with most other kinds of property, is owned by individuals and passes to the daughters in preference to the sons. The government of the entire state is hierarchic, the supreme authority resting in a body consisting of the rain priests of the six cardinal points—N., S., E., W., zenith, and nadir—the priestess of fecundity, assistant of the priest of the N., and the two head war priests. The priest of the N. is first among these and may be considered the high priest of Zuñi. Each of the male priests above enumerated, except the priest of the zenith, has assistants who usually succeed him and one another in regular order, but whose original appointment as assistants rests practically with their principal, although ostensibly he was appointed by the body of nine. The civil governor, his lieutenant, and the four assistants of each are nominated by the six rain priests and two war priests, though outside pressure may be brought to bear for or against this or that candidate. Although the governor attends to most civil matters, the appointing body acts as a final court of appeal in matters of extreme importance. His term of office is for one year, but he is eligible for reelection. War expeditions were formerly in the hands of the war priesthood under control of the two priests just referred to (Stevenson).

Sia is governed by two priests, with their vicars or intended successors. One priest has control over civil matters, the other over war and hunting. These offices are elective, the choice being limited to members of certain clans. Although the determinations reached by the two head priests and their vicars are referred to the heads of the ceremonial societies for confirmation, this is a mere matter of courtesy. They hold their positions for life and have the appointment of the subordinate officers who carry out their instructions. In Taos and a few other pueblos descent was patrilineal.

Like their neighbors, the Pueblos, the Navaho were divided into numerous clans, with female descent and prohibition of marriage within the mother's and the father's clans. In addition there were several sets of clans which could not intermarry and thus constituted phratries analogous to those of Eastern tribes. Matthews considers it probable that the Navaho clans had a local rather than a totemic origin, and this may be true of most of the Pueblo clans.

Among the Plains Indians the Omaha had a highly organized social system. The tribe was divided into 10 gentes called "villages," with descent through the father, each of which had one head chief. Seven of these chiefs constituted a sort of oligarchy, and two of them, representing the greatest amount of wealth, exercised superior authority. The functions of these chiefs were entirely civil; they never headed war parties. Below them were two orders of warriors, from the higher of which men were selected to act as policemen during the buffalo hunt. Under all were those who had not yet attained to eminence. During the buffalo hunts and great ceremonials the tribe encamped in a regular circle with one opening, like most other Plains tribes. In it each gens and even each family had its definite position. The two halves of this circle, composed of five clans each, had different names, but they do not appear to have corresponded to the phratries of more eastern Indians. A man was not permitted to marry into the gens of his father, and marriage into that of his mother was rare and strongly disapproved. Other Plains tribes of the Siouan family probably were organized in much the same manner and reckoned descent similarly. The Dakota are traditionally reputed to have been divided at one time into seven council fires, each of which was divided into two or three major and a multitude of minor bands. Whatever their original condition may have been, their organization is now much looser than that of the Omaha.

Most of the southern Caddoan tribes reckoned descent through the mother. The Caddo proper, who came from a timber country, had 10 clans with maternal descent.

The social organization of the western and northern Algonquian tribes is not well known. The Siksika have numerous subdivisions which have been called gentes; they are characterized by descent through the father, but would appear to be more truly local groups. Each had originally its own chief, and the council composed of these chiefs selected the chief of the tribe, their choice being governed rather by the character of the person than by his descent. The head chief's authority was made effective largely through the voluntary cooperation of several societies. The Chippewa, Potawatomi, Menominee, Miami, Shawnee, and Abnaki in historic times have had gentes, with paternal descent, which Morgan believed had developed from a maternal stage owing to white influence; but this theory must be viewed with caution, inasmuch as there never has been a question as to the form of descent among the Delawares, who were subjected to white influences at an earlier date than most of those supposed to have changed.

The Delawares consisted of three subtribes, called by geographic names from the regions occupied by them, each characterized by a special totem. Over each presided a head chief, said to have been elected by the heads of the other divisions; but more probably they merely inducted him into office. The chief of the Unami is said to have been ordinarily first in dignity. These chiefs were assisted by councils, composed of heads of wealthy families and prominent warriors; but their authority was almost entirely confined to civil matters. "War was declared by the people at the instigation of the 'war captains,' valorous braves of any birth or family who had distinguished themselves by personal prowess, and especially by good success in forays against the enemy" (Brinton, The Lenape, 1885). According to Morgan, each of the three tribes was subdivided into twelve groups, probably consanguineous, though it is uncertain whether they were geographic or totemic.

The towns constituting the Creek confederacy were composed of members of various clans, and each was ruled by a civil chief, or miko, assisted by two councils. The chief was elected for life from a particular clan, and appointed the head war chief of the town. The town council advised the miko on questions of intertribal policy as well as the appointment of minor officers, while the council of old men concerned itself with internal questions, such as those connected with the raising of corn. Below these ranked the "beloved men," and then the common people. Subordinate to the "great warrior" were two grades of war leaders. Members of the same clan are said to have occupied houses adjoining one another, and in the larger towns all these surrounded a central square, in which were the houses of the chiefs, the council houses, and the playground. It is known that some clans could not intermarry, and thus constituted phratries. The part which clans and phratries played in the composition of the councils, the appointment of officers, and the order of business has not been determined. The confederacy was so loosely constituted that decisions for war or peace rested directly with the individual towns. In cases where numbers of towns decided to go to war together they appointed a head war chief for themselves.

The Natchez were divided into two castes, called by the French nobility and puants. The first was again divided into suns, nobles, and honored men, the individuals of each of which were compelled to marry among the puants. Children of the women of the three noble classes belonged to the class of the mother, and children of the honored men by puant women also belonged to their mother's class. Children of puant women and sun men, however, belonged to the middle class of nobles, while children of puant women and noble men belonged to the honored. By the exhibition of superior qualities a man could raise himself from the puants as far at least as the middle class of nobles. The highest chief, or Great Sun, derived his power from the mythic lawgiver of the nation. Thus the state constituted a theocracy resembling that of the Quichua of Peru.

The most advanced social organization north of the Pueblo country was probably that developed by the Iroquois confederated tribes. Each tribe consisted of two or more phratries, which in turn embraced one or more clans, named after various animals or objects, while each clan consisted of one or more kinship groups called ohwachira. When the tribes combined to form the confederacy called the Five Nations they were arranged in three phratries, of two, two, and one tribes respectively. There were originally 48 hereditary chieftainships in the five tribes, and subsequently the number was raised to 50. Each chieftainship was held by some one ohwachira, and the selection of a person to fill it devolved on the child-bearing women of the clan to which it belonged, more particularly those of the ohwachira, which owned it. The selection had to be confirmed afterward by the tribal and league councils successively. With each chief a vice-chief was elected, who sat in the tribal council with the chief proper, and also acted as a leader in time of war, but the chief alone sat in the grand council of the confederacy. See Clan and Genes; Government.

Socorro (Span.: 'succor'). A former pueblo of the Piro on the site of the present town of Socorro, on the Rio Grande in New Mexico. So named by Oñate, in 1598, because of the friendly reception of the Spaniards by the inhabitants, who gave them a large quantity of corn. It was the seat of the Franciscan mission of Nuestra Señora del Socorro from 1626, and contained a church and monastery. At the outbreak of the Pueblo revolt in 1680 its population was 600, but most of the inhabitants followed the Spaniards, with whom they were friendly, to El Paso, and afterward established a village bearing the same name (distinguished as Socorro del Sur below that place on the Rio Grande in Texas. The walls of the old church were standing in 1692, and the ruins of the village were still visible in 1725, but no trace of the former settlement is now to be seen. Consult Baudelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 241 et seq., 1892. See also Piras, Pueblos. (F. W. H.)

Socorro del Sur ('Socorro of the South,' in contradistinction from Socorro (q. v.) in New Mexico). A small pueblo on both sides of the Rio Grande, a few m. below El Paso, Tex., the inhabitants of which, now completely Mexicanized, belonged to the Piro tribe, although there is evidence (Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 191, 1889) that Tano and Jemez people were among them. It was established in 1680–81 by Gov. Otermin with fugitive Indians chiefly from Socorro, N. Mex. It became the seat of a Spanish mission in 1682. See Piros, Pueblos. (F. W. H.)

Soenadut. A Maricopa rancheria on the Rio Gila, Ariz., in 1744.—Sedelmair (1744) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889.

Sofki, Sofkey. A thin sour corn gruel prepared by the Creek and other Indians formerly of the Gulf region, from corn, water, and lye. There are three kinds of the liquid: plain, sour, and white. The corn is pounded into a coarse meal, which is fanned in order to remove the broken grains and husks. Two quarts of the meal are put into a gallon pot of hot water, which is placed over a fire and allowed to boil. A perforated vessel is filled with clean wood ashes, on which water is poured to form a lye. The lye as it percolates through the ashes drops into the meal and water and turns the mixture yellow. Water is kept on the sofki for hours at a time, and, finally, after the mixture has become very thick, it is removed and allowed to cool. A half-dozen "blue dumplings" (a very palatable cornmeal preparation) are almost a necessary accompaniment of a mug of sofki. Pounded hickory-nuts are frequently added to the mixture, and marrow too, to improve the flavor. The vessel which is used expressly for preparing the meal is called a "sofki dish." The Yuchi name for sofki is tsoshi. The word is derived from the Creek dialect of the Muskogean language. The Cherokee know it as kannahena (Mooney). (W. R. G.)

Sogup. Given by Cortez (Pac. R. R. Rep., iii, pt. 3, 120, 1856) as one of 4 bands of the Ute, within or near the province of New Mexico in 1799.

Sohonut. Mentioned by Royce (18th Rep. B. A. E., 782, 1899), together with a number of other tribes, as ceding all their lands except a strip between Tejon pass and Kern r., Cal. They may have been Yokuts (Mariposan), Chumashan, or Shoshonean, but are not identified.

Soiones ('long wampum belt.'—Hewitt). An Onondaga chief who was leader of the embassy to the Hurons in 1647. He was a "Huron by nation, but so naturalized among the enemies within a number of years, that there is no Iroquois who has made more massacres in this country nor worse attacks than he." He brought three Huron captives from Onondaga (Jes. Rel. 1648, 56, 1858).

Soc-kail-kit.—McKee (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 194, 1853. Socktish.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1907 (a name sometimes applied). Sokohit.—Ibid., 1904. So-kéa-keit.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 139, 1853. Sok-kail-kit.—Meyer, Nach dem Sacramento, 282, 1855. Soktich.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1907.

Sokoki (apparently a contraction of Abnaki Sikukiak, 'people at the outlet.'—Gerard. See Abnaki). A tribe closely connected with the Abnaki and probably a part of the confederacy. Vetromile considered them as distinct (Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., vi, 211, 1859). He says: "Only five nations are reckoned in New England and Acadia, namely, the Mohegans, the Sokoquis, the Abnakis, the Etchimens, and the Micmacs." He and Ruttenber (Tribes Hudson R., 85, 1872) place them in the Mahican group. On the other hand, Williamson (Hist. Maine, 1832) and Maurault say they belonged to the Abnaki group, which is probably the correct conclusion. The Pequawket and Ossipee, on the upper Saco, were apparently branches of this tribe (Kidder in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., vi, 235, 1859). The tribe, including these, occupied the banks of Saco r., Me., the Sokoki being nearest to the mouth. Ruttenber believed they had occupied the w. bank of Hudson r. above Mohawk r. until driven out by the Mohawk in 1626. There is no reason to doubt, however, that the Indians Champlain found in 1604 at the mouth of the Saco, were of this tribe. Smith (1616) mentions Sowocatuck, perhaps their chief village. Champlain has preserved the name of one of the sachems of this people, Marchim, of Casco bay, "who had the reputation of being one of the bravest men of his country, and he had a fine manner, and all his gestures and movements were grave and dignified, savage though he was." The Sokoki are described by Gorges in 1658 as enemies of the Abnaki. They participated in King Philip's war in 1675, and some of them fled to Scaticook on the Hudson at its close. In 1725 the rest of the tribe retired to St Francis, Canada, with the Pequawket and others.

Sokulk. A small Shahaptian tribe located by Lewis and Clark on Columbia r., above the mouth of the Snake. They are known to the Nez Percés and Yakima as Wanapum, and their principal village is on the w. bank of the Columbia, at the foot of Priest rapids, Wash. The tribe has attracted some notice of late years from the fact that the noted religious leader and prophet Smohalla (q. v.) was their chief. The tribe was never included in any treaty and consequently is not officially recognized. Their number is estimated as between 150 and 200. (L. F.)

Sokut Menyil ('deer moon'). A Kawia village in Cahuilla valley, on the Torres res., s. Cal., said to have been so named because it was once a famous place in which to hunt deer by moonlight.

Solakiyu (So'-lak-i-yu). A former Nishinam village in the valley of Bear r., which is the next stream n. of Sacramento, Cal.

Solakeyu.—Powers in Overland Mo., XII, 22, 1874. So'-lak-i-yu.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 316, 1877.

Soldier. In the strict sense of the word the soldier did not exist in any of the tribes n. of Mexico, for among the aborigines there was no paid war force. Neither was there any group of men who served as an organized police to maintain order within the tribe, nor was there any body of men assigned, as in an army, to defensive or aggressive warfare. These duties, which are distinct in coordinated society, in the tribe were laid on every able-bodied man, who from his youth had been trained in the use of weapons, taught to be ready at a moment's notice to defend his home and to be the protector of the women and children. There was no school in which the men were drilled to act and move together. The methods of fighting were handed down by tradition, and boys and young men gained their first knowledge of the warrior's tactics chiefly from experiences related about the winter fire. Every village or camp was liable to attack, and their ever-present danger from enemies influenced the training and avocation of young men and determined the position near the door of the lodge, where they would be first to meet an intruding foe. There was, however, a class of men, warriors of approved valor, to whom were assigned special duties, as that of keeping the tribe in order during the annual hunt or at any great ceremonial where order was strictly to be enforced. It is this class which English-speaking observers have called "soldiers," for their power and prestige in the tribe corresponded more nearly with the rank held by the army than by any other set of men. The name by which this class of warriors was known in the language of some tribes meant "difficult to break or destroy," in other tribes "seizers" or "catchers," i.e. those who make captive. The first refers not only to the invincible courage of the men in war and in executing unswerving justice, but to their wealth upon which they could draw for generous contribution when a tribal appeal was made. If at any time one of these men should offend and be subject to punishment, which was frequently by flogging, only the man of equal or superior war honors could strike the heavy blows; a man of fewer honors could only touch the offender whose rank was higher than his own. In many tribes warriors were members of a society in which were orders or degrees.

The youth entered the lowest and gradually won promotion by his acts. Each degree or order had its insignia, and there were certain public duties to which it could be assigned. Every duty was performed without compensation, honor being the only reward. These societies were under the control of war chiefs and exercised much influence in tribal affairs. In other tribes war honors were won through the accomplishment of acts, all of which were graded, each honor having its peculiar mark or ornament which the man could wear after the right had been publicly accorded him. There were generally six grades of honors. It was from the highest grade that the "soldier" spoken of above was taken. See Coup, Military Societies, War and War Discipline. (A. C. F.)

Soledad (Span. 'solitude,' 'comfortlessness,' abbr. of Nuestra Señora de la Soledad, 'Our Lady of Solitude'). Formerly a Huichol village, but now a Mexican settlement, situated about 15 m. N. W. of Mezquitic, beyond the present limits of the Huichol country, in Jalisco, Mexico.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., II, 112, 1902.

Soledad Indians. A collective term used to designate the Indians of several distinct linguistic families that lived within the territory or under the authority of Soledad mission, Monterey co., Cal. They were Costanoan and probably Esselen and Salinan, together with Yokuts neophytes brought from the region of Tulare lake.

Solocks. A town of mixed population, under Oneida jurisdiction, situated, according to Evans' map of 1756, about 60 m. above Shamokin, on a creek issuing from the Great Swamp N. of the Cashuetunk mts. in Pennsylvania. On Pownall's map of 1776 it is placed on the left bank of the Susquehanna, above the mouth of Tunkhannock cr. (J. N. B. H.)

Somehulitk (Sō'mexulítx). A Heiltsuk tribe living at the upper end of Wikenolake, Brit. Col.; the name is applied also to one of its clans.—Boas in Nat. Mus. Rep. 1895, 328, 1897.

Somenos. A Salish tribe in Cowitchin valley, S. E. Vancouver id., speaking the Cowichan dialect; pop. 100 in 1909.

Somhótnechau.—Boas, MS. field notes. Sōmχótnechau.—Boas in Petermanns Mitteil., pt. 6, 130, 1887.

Sona. Mentioned by Oviedo (Hist. Gen. Indies, III, 628, 1853) as one of the provinces or villages, probably on the South Carolina coast, visited by Ayllon in 1520.

Sonagna. A former Gabrieleño village in Los Angeles co., Cal., at a locality later called White's ranch.—Ried (1852) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860.

Sonaque. A former tribe noted by Massanet (Dictamen Fiscal, MS., Nov. 30, 1716) on the road from Coahuila to the Texas country in 1690. It was probably of Coahuiltecan stock.

Sonayan. A former tribe noted by Massanet (Dictamen Fiscal, MS., Nov. 30, 1716) on the road from Coahuila to the Texas country in 1690. It was probably of Coahuiltecan stock and possibly identical with the Kouyam (q. v.), or Kouayon, of Joutel.

Soneto. A former village connected with San Francisco Solano mission, Cal.—Bancroft, Hist. Cal., II, 506, 1886.

Songish (adapted by the whites from Stad'ñges, the name of one of their septs). A Salish tribe about Victoria, Vancouver id., and on the W. shore of San Juan id., who call themselves Lkungen. This tribe gives its name to a Salish dialect spoken also by the Sanetch and Sooke of Vancouver id., by the Clallam of the S. side of Juan de Fuca str., and by the Samish, Semiahmoo, and Lummi of the coast S. of the Fraser delta. Population of the Songish proper, including Cheerno, Discovery id., Esquimalt, and Songish bands, 182 in 1906. Those speaking the Songish dialect number about 1,000. Their bands are Chikauach, Chkungen, Kekayaken, Kltasen, Ksapsem, Kukoak, Kukulek, Lelek, Sichanetl, Skingenes, Skuingkung, and Stsanges. (J. R. S.)

Etsāmish.—Toimie and Dawson, Vocab. Brit. Col., 119B, 1884 (so called by the tribes of the S. part of Puget sd.). Hue-lang-uh.—Mackay quoted by Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. Sonoita. A Papago rancheria on the headwaters of the Rio Salado of Sonora, just below the Arizona-Sonora boundary. It was visited in 1699 by the Jesuit Father Kino, who applied to it the name San Marcelo. It afterward became a mission, the name of which, apparently in May 1751, was changed to San Miguel in accordance with the wish of the Marques de Villapiente, who, at his death in 1739, endowed this mission and that of Busanic. In the same year (1751), during the Pima revolt against the Spaniards, the mission was destroyed and its missionary, Heinrich Ruen, killed by the natives. In 1776, when visited by Anza and Font, it was still in ruins. In 1865 the settlement contained 50 Papago families, commonly known as "Sand Papagos." (F. W. H.)

Arroyo del Sonoitac.—Anza and Font (1776) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 393, 1889. Carisal.—Kino, map (1701), ibid., 360. La Sone.—Audubon (1849), Western Jour., 147, 1906. San Marcelo.—Mange (1699) in Doc. Hist. Seráf., II, 421, 1792. Sonoi.—Garcés (1771) cited by Cones, Garcés Diary, 81, 1900. Sonoitac.—Garcés (1776), Diary, 455, 1900. Sonorita.—Poston misquoted by Browne, Apache Country, 291, 1869. Sonoytac.—Och (1756), Journey to the Missions, i, 71, 1809. Xonoidag.—Writer of 1702 (?), op. cit., 143. Zoñi.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 318, 1864 (probably identical).

Sonoita. A former rancheria of the Sohaipuri and a visita of the mission of Guevavi (from which it was situated 7 leagues, E. N. E.), on Rio Santa Cruz, N. of the present town of Nogales, s. Ariz. Pop. 91 in 1760. It became a visita of Tubutama in 1764, and was deserted before 1784. (F. W. H.)

Sonojowanga ('at Big Kettle's,' referring to a chief.—Hewitt). A former Seneca village on the E. bank of Genesee r., on the site of Mt Morris, Livingston co., N. Y. Big Kettle.—Morgan, League Iroq., 437, 1851. Shanawageras.—Phelps deed (1788) in Am. St. Papers, Ind. Aff., i, 210, 1882 (probably identical). So-no'-jo-wau-ga.—Morgan, op. cit.

Sonoma (from the Yukian Wappo terms so or tso, 'ground,' and noma, 'place,' 'location'). A name probably applied first by the Franciscan fathers to the vicinity of what is now the site of the town of Sonoma, Sonoma co., Cal., where the last mission in California was established (See San Francisco Solano). It is said that they took the name from that of one of the chiefs among the neophytes whom the fathers gathered about them at their mission, but it is not definitely known to what stock this chief belonged. The name, however, came to be applied to all the Indians of the mission and vicinity, and as there were people here of at least four or five distinct stocks, it is easy to account for statements made by such early writers as Chamisso, who says that the "Sonomi" spoke a language similar to the "Tamal," that is, a Miwok or Moquelumnan dialect. In fact the mission of Sonoma was situated in territory formerly belonging to Indians of this stock, and it is probable that a very considerable number of its converts were Moquelumnan Indians. The Sonomo, or Sonomi, mentioned by Taylor on the authority of settlers as speaking a dialect similar to that of the Suisun, were a later immigration into the valley; these were Wintun brought in to the mission from the vicinity of what is now Solano co. (S. A. B.)

Soul. The ideas relating to the soul are based principally on three mental processes: the formation of the concept of "power of acting" resident in a body, but distinct from the existence of the body; the formation of concepts due to the subjective feelings connected with imagery; and that of others due to the objective impressions made by memory images. Owing to these distinct sources from which the ideas combined under the term "soul" spring, they show considerable diversity of form. The principal concept representing the first-named group of ideas is that of "life," with which the power of acting is bound up—either the life of the whole body, or that of parts of the body or of special organs. Thus the Hidatsa and the Fraser River tribes of British Columbia believe in several souls, the loss of one of which causes partial loss of life, i. e. sickness, while the loss of all, or of the principal one, entails death. In other cases the "life" is associated with the vital organs, such as blood and breath, the loss of which causes death; but this particular idea is not strongly developed among the American aborigines. It is not necessary that this "life" should be considered in anthropomorphic form.

Another concept of the "soul" is based on the association of the phenomena of will power, which are conceived of as separate from the body acting in accordance with the dictates of the will. These associations are expressed particularly in the beliefs relating to "will-souls" of animals and inanimate objects, and in those of guardian spirits that carry out the wishes of their owners.

The forms that these ideas regarding the soul assume are deeply influenced by the second and third groups of mental processes already referred to. The power of imagery, which is inherent in every person, manifests itself in memory images, in the conceptions of fancy, in dreams, and in hallucinations. The subjective impressions of imagery find expression most readily in the creation of an image which has an entity similar to the self, but separate from it, able to leave the body and to visit distant places and to see past and future. This entity, although similar to the self, is nevertheless not discernible to our senses. In this group of ideas may be classed the belief of the Nootka in the soul of a person in the form of a tiny man, and the similar beliefs of the Hurons and the Eskimo.

Objectively, imagery shows us distant objects as present, and thus the same twofold existence that is experienced by the self appears to belong to the outer world; and it is of particular importance to note that things gone and past, like the dead, may appear in one's mental images in full vigor. Thus the three lines of thought lead to the belief in souls separate from the body, often in human form, and continuing to exist after death.

The lack of tangibility of the soul has led everywhere among Indians to the belief that it is visible to shamans only, or at least that it is like a shadow (Algonquian), like an unsubstantial image (Eskimo), or that its trail and footprints only can be seen (Shasta), or that it glides through the air without touching the earth (Omaha). Peculiar is the notion of the soul as a butterfly or a bird (Tsimshian, Bellaçoola), which, however, is not so common in America as in other parts of the world. This idea is probably derived from independent psychological sources. The same is probably the case with the mythic notion of the "life" which is kept outside of the body, in a box, a hat, in the form of a thread, etc., and the destruction of which terminates the life of its owner (N. W. coast, California); and of the identification of the soul of the dead with the owl, which is of almost universal occurrence. Perhaps the flitting motions of the owl, combined with its human likeness, have associated themselves with the idea of the unsubstantial soul. Among the Eskimo the memory image attached to the name is so strong that the name has a separate entity and is considered a soul which enters the person who is given the name of the deceased.

The beliefs relating to the soul's existence after death are very uniform, not only in North America, but all over the world. The souls live in the land of the dead in the form that they had in life, and continue their former occupations. Detailed descriptions of the land of the dead are found among almost all American tribes. Often the physical conditions in the land of the dead are the reverse of those in our world: when it is night here, it is day there; when it is summer here it is winter there. The Eskimo tribes believe in several worlds of this kind. Those who suffer violent deaths go to the sky, while those who die of sickness go to another world. The Indians of Vancouver id. believe that the villages of the dead are near their own villages, but invisible; but the most common notion is that of the world of the ghosts lying in the distant west beyond a river which must be crossed by canoe. This notion is found on the western plateaus and on the Plains. The Algonquians believe that the brother of the culture hero lives with the souls of the dead. Visits to the world of the dead by people who have been in a trance are one of the common elements of American folklore. They have been reported from almost all over the continent. See Mythology, Religion. (F. B.)

Souligny. A war chief of the Menominee tribe, born in 1785. His grandfather was one Souligny, an early French trader, who married a Menominee woman. In 1812 Souligny was one of a large party of Sioux, Winnebago, and Menominee which, under the British colonel, Robert Dickson, captured the fort at Mackinaw from the Americans. The following year Souligny with about 50 warriors, and White Elk, a chief of distinction, united with Tecumseh in time to participate in the battle of Ft. Meigs, on Miami r., Ohio. He took an active part in the battle at Mackinaw, Mich., in which the American commander, Major Holmes, was killed; he also served in Stambaugh's expedition.

SOULIGNY (1785-1864), HEAD WAR CHIEF OF THE MENOMINEE
(WIS. HIST. SOC.)

Although he fought against the Americans during the War of 1812, in the Black Hawk war of 1837 he espoused their cause. In Mar. 1855 Souligny and Oshkosh, another Menominee chief, visited the office of the Milwaukee Sentinel and asked that the editor give publicity to their petition for the return of an Indian child who had been kidnapped by the whites. At this time Souligny was 70 years of age, but spoke with all the energy of one in the prime of life. He is described as being a stout, good-looking man, despite the loss of an eye. He died of erysipelas in Dec. 1864, at his home on the w. bank of Wolf r., Wis., at what is known as the Great Falls. His portrait, painted by Samuel Brookes, is in possession of the Wisconsin Historical Society at Madison. (F. S. N.)

Sounikaeronon. The Iroquois name for a tribe defeated by them a few years before 1682 (La Salle in Margry, Déc., II, 237, 1877). In this name ronon is the tribal suffix.

South Andrian Band. A band of Shuwap, formerly known as the Adam's Lake band.—Can. Ind. Aff., 74, 1878.

Southern Ute. The general official designation of the Ute (q. v.) under the Ft Lewis and Southern Ute school superintendency, s. w. Colorado, on a reservation comprising 483,750 acres. They comprise the Capote, Moache, and Wiminuche bands, with an aggregate population of 806 in 1909. They are decreasing in numbers.

The Wiminuche are the strongest numerically (454 individuals), and occupy the s. w. portion of the reservation, near Mesa Verde; they are the "unallotted" part of the tribe and endeavor to remain as far as possible in a primitive state. The Moache, next in population, and the Capote, are settled about Ignacio; their lands have been allotted in severalty, they do some farming with Government aid, and are somewhat more civilized than the Wiminuche.

Of the early history of the Southern Ute but little is known; they occupied portions of Utah, Colorado, and New Mexico, and possibly even Arizona. In 1775 Father Escalante visited them, describing them as "inhabiting the region north of the Moquis." Toward the middle of the 19th century they were estimated at 200 lodges, with from 1,400 to 2,000 souls. They have occupied their present reservation since 1863.

The Southern Ute are neither industrious nor wealthy. The family property consists at best of a tent, a few ponies, a wagon, and a few head of cattle, sheep, or goats. The aged members of the Wiminuche band are still receiving rations, while the Moache and Capote about Ignacio are assisted in other ways. They live, by preference, in tipis or brush shelters; only a few of those at Ignacio have houses of adobe. The furnishings of the dwelling are of the rudest description, consisting chiefly of a quantity of rags, a soiled cotton blanket or two, one or two water-gourds, and sometimes a sheep skin or a goatskin. Other individual property may consist of a saddle, bow and arrows, or a gun or revolver, a few cups, pans, cans, and a bag containing extra clothing and ornaments. The middle of the dwelling is occupied by a small fireplace. Among the Wiminuche the tipis are often moved from place to place, while the huts are abandoned or destroyed.

The people all dress to-day chiefly in the clothing of civilization; the blanket, or in its absence a calico shawl, is still a favorite part of the costume. The women often wear leather belts. Decoration is more highly regarded than clothing and consists chiefly of objects covered with beadwork, as pouches, knife-scabbards, belts, etc., of necklaces, and sometimes breast-plates of porcupine quills. Medallions and badges, and copper or silver earrings, are much in favor among the men. Both sexes wear deerskin moccasins ornamented with beadwork. A sombrero decorated with a ribbon or a feather, is preferred by the men as a head-covering. The men wear their hair in two braids, hanging over the chest; some of the men wear another small braid depending from the middle of the scalp. The women wear the hair loose, cut above the brows and at the back to convenient length.

The occupations of these people are few. Once subsisting by the chase, they are not good laborers, nor do they take kindly to farming. They are neither weavers nor potters, and only a limited trade is conducted with other tribes. Indolence is characteristic of the younger men, and it is apparent that the tribe is passing through a period of degradation. The family life is of a rather low order. Marriage is easily contracted and as easily dissolved, and the custom of exchanging wives is said to occur. Polygyny is practised, though to a lesser extent than formerly. The morals of the Wiminuche particularly are bad. Gambling is prevalent, a woman often neglecting her children for a game of cards. The aged are neglected by their offspring, being suffered to shift for themselves. The natural abilities of the people, however, are not inferior to those of other tribes. The children are bright, and considerable artistic talent is exhibited by both men and women. The tribe preserves remnants of what may have been a clan organization, and each band recognizes a distinct chief. In important matters the families act together. Intermarriage among the three bands is not prohibited. Friendship exists and visits are exchanged between the Southern Ute and the Cheyenne and Arapaho. Little progress has been made toward Christianity. They still practise a few ceremonies and perform a few dances, among the latter being a "bear dance," which takes place in spring. They dispose of the dead as soon as possible either by burying in the ground or, preferably, by depositing the remains in crevices in the rocks, the situation of which is carefully guarded. The dwelling of the deceased, with all his property, is burned. An observance still common among both sexes is face painting in many colors and designs, to some extent symbolic. Physically the people exhibit a characteristic physiognomy, which, with their hair-dress, makes them easy of recognition as Southern Ute. They are short in stature, and the men are considerably inclined to obesity. In color they are moderately brown or yellowish brown. Few of the young women are handsome, and the old ones usually are very ugly. The hair shows the usual Indian characteristics; the beard, as among most tribes, is eradicated. Measurements of 50 male adults indicate an average height of 166.8 cm. The cephalic index shows a rather wide range, with a predominance of mesocephaly. The tribe is less pure in blood than the more northerly Ute. (A. H.) Siddell's Ute.—ten Kate, Reizen in N. A., 314, 1885 (Dutch form).

Spade-stones. Prehistoric objects of polished stone, the purpose of which has not been determined, but as they are symmetrically shaped, carefully finished, and rarely show decided marks of use, and besides are sometimes made of soft stone of several varieties, archeologists are disposed to assign them to ceremonial use. The name has been given them because they resemble somewhat ordinary spades, although some varieties are as much like blades of axes, hoes, or shovels. This name will serve as well as any other for purposes of description. For the present, all of these objects may be grouped between the two extremes of form, the hoe or ax shaped variety with broad, thick blade and short stem, and the long-shafted variety with small, somewhat rudimentary blade. Many of the intermediate forms, being rather short and thick, approach the celt in appearance. The recent discovery by Moore of specimens of the short, broad-bladed variety retaining traces of hafting has led to the suggestion that these, and possibly the whole group of objects here considered, are ceremonial derivatives of the celt. The longer-shafted forms correspond in general appearance to the long-shafted copper celts found by Moore in Southern mounds. A number of these objects are said to show effects of use in scraping, digging, or other service resulting in abrasion of the blade, and

C. C. Jones, describing specimens in his own collection, takes the view that they were scrapers; but it seems possible that the wear in such cases may be the result of secondary use by persons not acquainted with the original, normal functions of the objects. A characteristic feature of the broad, short forms is a perforation, which occurs generally near the upper part of the blade and occasionally well up the shaft. A few have the perforation near the top, giving the appearance of a pendant ornament. A characteristic feature of the slender-shafted variety is the occurrence of a number of small notches in the margin of the upper part of the blade.

These objects are not numerous in any section, but the various types are widely distributed over the country E. of the great plains. The short, broad-bladed form prevails in the Southern states, and the small-bladed, long-handled variety in the N. and N. W. They occur generally in mounds in connection with burials. See Problematical objects.

Spanguliken. A word in use in several parts of the State of New York formerly inhabited by the Delawares as a term for a conceited or a vain person, and for a "know-it-all." The word is a corruption of Lenape äspinguliechsin, meaning 'to raise the eyes in speaking,' that is, to be supercilious. It corresponds pretty well to Latin superciliosus, from supercilium, 'haughtiness,' as expressed by raising the eyebrows (from super, 'above,' and cilium, 'eyebrow,' 'eyelid').

Spanish influence. The influence of the Spaniards on the aborigines of America N. of Mexico was very marked along the whole southern border from Florida to California; but it was most notable in the W., where greater numbers of aborigines were present to be affected by the processes of colonization. Elsewhere in North America the Spanish adventurers and fishermen left slight evidences of their sojourn. A trace of Spanish influence, through Basque fishermen, is found in the early accounts of the Micmac (Lescarbot, Hist. Nouv. France, 668, 1612), where a few words of Spanish or of Basque origin were preserved in the jargon used between natives and Europeans.

On the opposite side of the continent the people of Vancouver id. were affected by the Spanish settlements in California, for some of the Indians of this coast were brought down to the Catholic missions. Contrary to a widespread belief, there is no Spanish element in the Chinook jargon. In Florida, where Spanish domination extended over two centuries, the Indian tribes of the northern and central sections were much influenced by the European colonists, as appears from Margry, Dickenson, and other documentary sources. This was particularly true of the Apalachee and the Timucua, whose prosperity continued until the destruction of the missions by the English and their Indian allies between 1702 and 1708, after which the ruin of the native tribes was completed by the inroads of the Creeks. The vocabularies of all the Southern tribes show Spanish influence, as, for example, the word waka, for vaca, 'cow'. The Eno of North Carolina in 1654 met with Spaniards who had come from the gold regions of the southern Alleghanies (Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, 58, 1894), while Spanish intimacy in South Carolina began as early as the establishment of the post at Santa Elena in 1567. Spanish slavers decimated the minor tribes of the Carolina and Georgia coast. In Texas as many as 10,000 Indians were gathered into the missions, some of whose massive buildings still remain in fair preservation, and a considerable strain of blood of the Mexican element of to-day is known to be of Indian origin. Spanish blood, introduced by capture, enters to some extent into the composition of most of the southern Plains tribes, as well as of the Apache, and the Spanish language is still a frequent means of intertribal communication in many parts of the S. W. The Caddo of Louisiana, as early as 1688, according to Tonti, called the horse cavali, evidently from the Spanish caballo, which word has furnished the name of this animal to many Southwestern tribes.

The effects of the Spanish occupancy of the S. W. have been discussed in detail by Bandelier (Papers Arch. Inst. Am.), Blackmar (Spanish Colonization in the S. W., 1890; Spanish Institutions of the S. W., 1891, and Bancroft (History of the Pacific States). The fame of the so-called Seven Cities of Cibola and the quest for gold led the Spaniards northward from Old Mexico as early as 1539. Within the present bounds of Arizona the permanent results of Spanish occupancy were of consequence through the planting of Jesuit missions in the southern part of the territory, in the latter part of the 17th century, where the Pima and Papago were chiefly concerned. The expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767 and the transfer of authority to the Franciscans affected the Indians unfavorably, at first, but the missions prospered again later, and the famous church of San Xavier del Bac (q. v.) still stands as a monument to their skill and energy. The unsatisfactory condition of affairs in Mexico, the constant incursions of the Apache, and the neglect of the outlying garrisons caused the missions almost to cease their activity by 1830, and in 1853, by the Gadsden purchase, s. Arizona passed into the possession of the United States.

On the Hopi of N. E. Arizona the Spaniards made no such deep impression as on the Pueblos of the Rio Grande, chiefly for the reason that missions were not re-established among the former after the Pueblo rebellion of 1680-92. Nevertheless, the introduction of horses, burros, sheep, goats, cattle, wheat, peaches, firearms, the cart, the wooden plow, iron axes, adzes, and other tools, and probably the hand loom, had marked effect on the daily life of the people even if it did not affect their religious beliefs and practices. The introduction of sheep alone had an important result, no small measure of which was the complete changing of the Navaho, once largely a predatory tribe like their Apache cousins, into a pastoral people. In New Mexico the influence of the Spaniards was more lasting and far-reaching than in Arizona. The Europeans were welcomed at first and hospitably received, the natives even taking kindly to the new religion of the missionaries as powerful "new medicine," adding to their own ancient rites and ceremonies those of the Roman Catholic church and even sincerely adopting the latter so long as the protection of the Spaniards against the predatory tribes was effective. The Indians, it should be said, were not affected by the Inquisition, being regarded as minors so far as religious matters were concerned. Not only is the outward form of Christianity preserved among the New Mexican Pueblos, but for many things they hold the Christian religion to be the only potent magic, "God being regarded as an outside spiritual being who can do much good within a certain sphere of action and great harm if interfered with from the other side of the house" (Bandelier, inf'n, 1905). Tools of Spanish provenience largely replaced the wooden dibble, greatly facilitating agriculture; the Spanish cart, however clumsy, was a vast improvement over the former method of transporting the harvest on the back; while the horse, the mule, and the burro promoted travel and traffic to a degree almost beyond reckoning, and supplied the machinery for threshing the wheat, that was unknown before the Spaniards came. The houses also show the effect of Spanish influence when compared with the ruins of ancient dwellings. The horse making it possible to transport longer beams, the rooms are more capacious than formerly. Wooden doors and windows, molded adobe bricks, chimneys, and probably surface ovens also owe their origin to the Spaniards, as do likewise doorways to the lower rooms, access to which was formerly gained through the roof until the presence of the whites made no longer necessary this device for protection against predatory enemies. The Spaniards made some changes in the method of government of the New Mexican Pueblos, causing each to elect annually a governor and other civil officers, a custom still prevailing, although the governor is usually selected by the caciques, and is not much more than their mouthpiece.

From Bourke's résumé of "The Laws of Spain in their Application to the American Indians" (Am. Anthr., VII, 193, 1894) we gain a more favorable view of the disposition of the Spanish authorities than is generally entertained. The Spaniards accepted more or less assimilation, and "left upon the American continent communities of aborigines whose social and moral condition has been most appreciably improved by the introduction of horses, cattle, sheep, goats, hogs, and chickens, the planting of orchards of peaches, oranges, and other fruits, as well as vineyards, and instruction in such new trades as carpentry, saddlery, blacksmithing, and wagon making, or the improvement of such prehistoric handicrafts as stone masonry, weaving, basket-making, and pottery." As Bourke points out, some of these Spanish laws continue still to be observed in the Indian pueblos. In the villages of New Mexico, for example, the Indians sell in their own markets and not to those they meet on the way thither. As Bandelier (Papers Arch. Inst. Am., 188-319, 1890) and Lummis (Spanish Pioneers, 1893) have shown, the charges against the Spaniards of enslaving the Indians in the mines have not been sustained, such servitude being contrary to the letter and the spirit of the law. Moreover, captives and slaves were often redeemed from the wilder tribes, as the villages of Genizaros established before 1648 at Abiquin and afterward at Tomé and Belen on the Rio Grande prove. The Protectores de los Indios, at first the prelates of the country, performed somewhat the same functions as our Indian agents. The system of pueblo grants had its advantages for the Indians, and many of the Spanish enactments "enlarged their scope of vision and fostered the thought of individuality." The industrial training of the Franciscans began early, and though to-day some of the Pueblos have the tools and appliances of medieval Spain—the old plow, the two-wheeled cart, the clumsy iron ax, and the crude saw—even these constituted a considerable advance over primitive implements—the digging stick, fire-drill, etc., while the addition of numerous domesticated animals and plants made possible progress in various ways. Bandelier is of the opinion that "in many respects the Apache, Comanche, the Navaho above all, owe more to European culture introduced by Spain than the Pueblos." The introduction of the horse made speedy travel possible and the acquisition of fire-arms enabled some of these Indians to compete on fairly even terms with the whites. As a result of white contact the Indians of the New Mexico pueblos abandoned for a time the making of blankets, an art learned from them by the Navaho, who attained great skill in it, and paid less attention to the elaboration of their pottery. These facts, as Bandelier observes, may be evidences, not of decadence, but of progress. Of the general intent and effect of Spanish laws relating to the Indian, Bandelier, it may be observed, takes the same sympathetic view as do Lummis and Bourke.

While the Pueblos of New Mexico had their missions, and the fathers often acquitted themselves heroically in their hard labors, California was the scene of the exploitation of the mission idea on a scale impossible where the Indians themselves were of the character and social condition exemplified among the Pueblos. The first Spanish colony in California proper was established at San Diego in 1769 as a result of the expedition of Galvez. By 1834 there were 21 missions, extending in an irregular line for more than 600 m. along the coast, linking together the most fertile valleys of California. Connected with these missions were 30,650 Indians; the cattle numbered 424,000; the bushels of grain harvested, 100,000;

the value of the product, $2,000,000; the movable stock, apart from buildings, orchards, vineyards, etc., $3,000,000; annual income of the pious fund, $50,000. Eight years later only 4,450 Indians remained and other things had declined in proportion. Secularization of the missions by the Mexican Government was in part responsible for this, though previous individual and temporary abuses and vacillation in policy, as for example the changes from one religious order to another or transfer of the missions to the care of secular ecclesiastics or of political officers, were often detrimental. By the time of the American occupancy in 1846 the decline was complete; "a small number of the natives were still living at the missions, but the majority had returned to their rancherias in the mountains and districts remote from the settlements." Since then some of the missions have crumbled to dust and many of the Indian tribes have vanished with them or linger only in insignificant numbers, but the buildings and other remains evidence the extent of this remarkable, though in the end unsuccessful, attempt to make over thousands of the aborigines of the New World. The influence of Spain can be seen among them still, but they were too much domesticated, and the change from the friar and the priest to the Anglo-Saxon pioneer, the cowboy, and the miner proved too masterful for them. What the Spaniards accomplished in California in the brief space of 50 years was a marvel, but an evanescent one. The results of Indian labor can be seen over all California, but the sons and daughters of the workers are no more. The story of the Spanish missions of California, New Mexico, and Texas will ever be one of the most interesting in the annals of American history. Spatlum. A name which, with variants spatulum, spatlam, and spatlum, has long been applied to the "bitter-root," Lewisia rediviva, a succulent perennial of upper Oregon, the root of which is highly prized by the Indians as an article of food. As the root is very small, it requires much labor to gather a bagful, which commands the price of a horse. The plant was observed in use among the natives by Lewis and Clark, and its supposed name was obtained from Lewis's manuscript by Pursh, who gives it as spatium ("Spallum Aboriginorum"). The name, which is Salishan, is here a misapplication, since spatlum in the Comox dialect (spätlum in the Kwantlin) is the name for tobacco. (W. R. G.)

Spemicalawba ('High Horn,' from spūmuk, 'high'; the common spelling of the name). A Shawnee chief, known to the whites as Captain James Logan. His mother was Tecumtha's (Tecumseh's) sister. When a boy, in 1786, he was captured by Gen. Logan, of Kentucky, while the latter was on an expedition against the Ohio tribes. The general took the boy into his own family, sent him to school, gave him his own name, and then sent him back to his tribe. The result was that Logan thenceforth was the firm friend of the whites. He afterward married an Indian woman, who, like himself, had been taken under similar conditions and resided with the family of Col. Hardin, of Kentucky, for several years. He endeavored unsuccessfully to dissuade Tecumtha from hostilities, and in the War of 1812 enlisted on the side of the Americans, doing good service as a scout and spy in the Ohio region. His good faith having been called into question on one occasion when his party had retreated before a superior force, he determined to prove his loyalty, and setting out with two Indian companions down the Maumee r., encountered near the rapids the British Captain Elliot with 5 Indians, who claimed Logan's party as prisoners. Watching an opportunity, Logan's men attacked the others, killing Elliot and two of his Indians, but with the dangerous wounding of Logan and one of his men. Taking their enemies' horses, they made their way to the camp of the American General Winchester, where Logan died two days after, Nov. 24, 1812. He was buried with the honors due his rank and received warm eulogies from Gen. Winchester and Maj. Hardin. In person he is described as of fine physique, with features expressive of courage, intelligence, good humor, and sincerity. His usual residence was at the Shawnee town of Wapakoneta, Ohio. Logansport, Ind., takes its name from him. His name occurs also as Spamagelabe. (J. M.)

Spichehat. A tribe or village formerly in the country between Matagorda bay and Maligne (Colorado) r., Texas. The name seems to have been given to Joutel in 1687 by the Ebahamo, a tribe probably closely affiliated with the Karankawa, which dwelt in this region. See Gatschet, Karankawa Inds., Peabody Mus. Spine-back Stones. A descriptive term for a number of objects of stone, the use of which is problematical. They are somewhat related in their form to the pierced tablets and the boat-shaped stones (q. v.), and have two perforations for attachment or suspension. Nearly all are made of slate, and are neatly shaped and polished. In length they vary from 4 to 6 in. The under side is flattish and the ends are unequal, one being pointed and the other blunt and often sloping upward, while the convex back rises into a somewhat pronounced knob, or spine, which is doubtless reminiscent of some characteristic animal feature. These interesting objects are suggestive of the small carvings representing the spine back whale found in ancient graves of California. See Problematical objects. (W. H. H.)

Spirit Walker. A chief of the Wahpeton Sioux, born at Lacquiparle, Minn., about 1795. He was early converted to Christianity and was friendly in the Sioux outbreak of 1862, but fled to Dakota after the defeat of Little Crow. Mrs Marble, the Spirit Lake captive of 1857, was rescued by Grayfoot and Sounding Heavens, sons of Spirit Walker. (D. N.)

Spitatha. One of the 5 original divisions or bands of the Shawnee (W. H. Shawnee in Gulf States Hist. Mag., 1, 415, 1903). Evidently distinct from Kispokotha, but probably the same as Mequachake, q. v.

Spokan. A name applied to several small bodies of Salish on and near Spokane r., N. W. Wash. According to Gibbs the name was originally employed by the Skitawish to designate a band at the forks of the river, called also Smahoomenash. By the whites it was extended to cover several nearly allied divisions, which Gibbs enumerates as follows: Sin-slik-hoo-ish, Sintootoolish, Sma-hoo-men-a-ish (Spokenish), Skai-achil-t'nish, Ske-chei-a-mouse, Schu-el-stish, Sin-poll-schne, Sin-shee-lush. The last two were claimed by the Okinagan also. All of them are now held to be separate divisions and not bands of one tribe. The population was estimated by Lewis and Clark in 1805 at 600 in 30 houses, and by Gibbs in 1853 at 450. In 1908 there were 301 "Lower Spokane" and 238 "Upper Spokane" under Colville agency, Wash., and 95 Spokane on Coeur d'Alene res., Idaho; total, 634. In 1909 the entire number of Spokane in Washington was 609, while those in Idaho numbered 104. Flat Heads.—Dart in Ind Aff. Spools. Small prehistoric objects somewhat resembling spools, the purpose of which is unknown. They are nearly cylindrical, with incurved sides, perforated lengthwise at the center, and are made in most cases of sandstone, a few specimens being of baked clay. Their length varies from 1 to 2½ in. and their diameter rarely exceeds 2 in. The surface is always covered with incised lines arranged in what is apparently intended for a definite order or design, but no two are alike. They are not numerous, and, with the exception of a few from Ross co., Ohio, all are from counties bordering the Ohio r. between the Big Sandy and the Miami. Consult Fowke, Archaeol. Hist. Ohio, 1902; Moorehead, Prehist. Impls., 1900; Squier and Davis, Ancient Monuments, 1848; Thurston, Antiq. of Tenn., 1897. (C. F.)

Spoons and Ladles. Utensils for carrying liquid food or water to the mouth or from one vessel to another were found among all tribes of the United States. They were made of a wide variety of materials, as stone, shell, bone, horn, antler, ivory, wood, gourd, bark, basketry, and pottery were employed. In size they exceeded European utensils of this class. Beverley (Hist. Va., 154, 1722) thus refers to them: "The spoons which they eat with, do generally hold half a pint; and they laugh at the English for using small ones, which they must be forced to carry so often to their mouths, that their arms are in danger of being tired, before their Belly."

The animals supplying the most materials for spoons, dipper, and ladles were the mountain sheep and mountain goat. All the tribes living in the habitat of these animals utilized their horns for this purpose, and the manufactured products were distributed widely in trade among neighboring tribes. Specimens have been gathered among the Pueblos, Havasupai, Ute, Cheyenne, and Sioux, the Salishan and northern Algonquian tribes, and the N. W. Coast and Athapaskan tribes. Among the southern Rocky Mountain Indians these utensils were rude, but the northern tribes made them works of art, softening the horn and bending and shaping it over forms by means of heat, and carving and inlaying the material with great skill. Spoons were also made from the horns of the buffalo. After cattle were introduced their horns were substituted, especially among the Plains tribes, for those of the disappearing wild animals.

Antler spoons.—A few tribes of N. California and Columbia r. used spoons made of antler. The Hupa spoons are characteristic and well made, and men's and women's spoons are of different shapes. The Eskimos sometimes made small spoons from antler, and in rare cases employed bone or ivory, though these materials are hard to work. Some of their fat-scrapers resemble spoons, and they used narrow bowl spoons as marrow extractors.

Wooden spoons and ladles.—The majority of spoons, dippers, and ladles were made of wood. The Eskimo and northern Athapascan tribes produced a variety of such utensils that exhibited some degree of art; but the tribes of the N. W. coast and of S. Alaska surpassed all others in the variety, grace of form, and decoration of these as well as other domestic objects. The tribes of the S. W. utilized wood to some extent for spoons and ladles, but these were always rude and were generally fashioned from knots. There is remarkable uniformity in the shape of utensils of this class among the Eastern and Southern Indians from New York to Florida. They all had the pointed bowl, a form which occurs in no other part of the United States.

Gourds.—The gourd, like the decayed knot, is a natural dipping instrument, and its use as such readily suggested itself. Gourds were extensively used and their forms were often repeated in pottery.

Shell spoons and dippers.—Wherever shells were available they were used in their natural form as dippers and were wrought into spoons. Spoons of shell, artistically worked, have been found in the mounds of Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Ohio.

Pottery ladles and spoons.—Numerous objects of this class are found on the ancient sites of pottery-making tribes, and the Pueblo Indians, especially the Hopi, still manufacture them in great variety. In general the spoons follow the older elliptic shallow forms cut from gourds, while the dippers are characteristic, having a tubular or trough-like handle and an ample bowl, the latter sometimes saucer-shaped, but generally of the form of a small food bowl. The handles are often decorated with bands or short lines of color, and the terminal end is frequently modeled in the form of an animal's head. Cups with a small loop handle were and are common among the Hopi. See Receptacles. (W. H.)

Spotted Arm. An influential Winnebago chief, born about 1772, known among his tribesmen as Manahketshumpkaw, and sometimes called Broken Arm by the whites, from the fact that he had been severely wounded in the arm at the siege of Ft Meigs in 1813, where he distinguished himself. It was his custom in after years to paint the scar in representation of a fresh wound. Spotted Arm was a signer of the Green Bay treaty in 1828, and during the Black Hawk war in 1832 he was one of three important headmen held by the whites as hostages for the good behavior of the Winnebago. He is described as having been stoop-shouldered and ill-shaped, but as possessing a mild and agreeable temperament. His village, known as Spotted Arm's village, was situated near the present Exeter, Green co., Wis. He died a few years after the Black Hawk war, having removed with his people to their new lands beyond the Mississippi after the Rock Island treaty of 1832. See Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., VIII, 1879; X, 1888.

Spotted Tail (Sinte-galeshka). A Brulé Teton Sioux chief, born about 1833 near Ft Laramie, Wyo. He was not a chief by birth, but rose by dint of his fighting qualities. He won his wife in a duel with a subchief and proved his prowess in battle, so that when the head chief died the tribe passed over the hereditary claimant and aspirants of riper years and experience in favor of the young warrior. He had borne a conspicuous part in the destruction of Lieut. Grattan's detachment in 1854 when it entered the Brulé camp to arrest an Indian who had taken an old cow abandoned by some emigrants, and in the subsequent depredations on the Oregon trail. After signal punishment was inflicted on the tribe by Gen. Harney at Ash Hollow, W. Nebr., Spotted Tail and two others of the murderers, whose surrender was demanded, surprised the soldiers at Ft Laramie by marching in, arrayed in war dress and chanting their death songs, to give themselves up in order that the tribe might be spared. He regained his freedom and was chief of the Lower Brulés in 1865, when commissioners treated with the Sioux for a right of way through Montana, and was in favor of the treaty, though neither he nor any other prominent chief signed, while Red Cloud, the Oglala chief, led the party that opposed the cession of the overland route to the Montana mines. With the other chiefs he signed the treaty of Apr. 29, 1868, accepting for the Teton a reservation embracing all the present South Dakota W. of Missouri r., and assenting to the construction of a railroad, the Government acknowledging as unceded Indian territory the sections of Wyoming and Montana n. of the North Platte as far w. as Bighorn mts. and abandoning the road to the mines, with Ft. Phil. Kearny, where the massacre of Lieut. Col. William J. Fetterman's command had occurred on Dec. 21, 1866, and Ft

SPOTTED TAIL

Reno near the head of Powder r. When gold was discovered in the Black hills, Spotted Tail and Red Cloud, who were recognized as the chiefs at the respective agencies called by their names, arranged to go to Washington to negotiate a sale of the mineral rights; and thoroughly to inform himself of the value of the minerals, Spotted Tail visited the hills, hung around the camps of the prospectors, listened to their talk, and conceived the idea therefrom that the mines were immensely valuable. Under the treaty of 1868 the chiefs could not make treaties for sale of lands, hence commissioners were sent to the Indians, finding that Spotted Tail had raised the Indian expectations so high that sixty million dollars were demanded for the concession. The Government could not agree to this, hence no treaty was made that year, and miners were permitted by the troops to pass into the Black hills without hindrance. Then all the young men on the reservation joined the hostiles. Red Cloud was suspected of disloyalty, and in the course of the campaign that followed the Custer disaster in 1876, Spotted Tail was appointed chief of all the Indians at both agencies, and negotiated the settlement by which his nephew, Crazy Horse, came in from Powder r. and surrendered in the spring of 1877. Spotted Tail was killed near Rosebud agency, S. Dak., Aug. 5, 1881, by a tribesman named Crow Dog. The facts relating to the killing are in dispute, but there is not much question that Spotted Tail, at the time, was leading a hostile party against Crow Dog, who deemed his life in peril and shot in self-defense. Spruce-tree House. A ruined cliff-dwelling, situated in the Mesa Verde National Park, about 25 m. from Mancos, Colo. Next to Cliff Palace, this ruin is the largest cliff-house in Colorado. It occupies a great natural cave in the n. wall of Spruce-tree canyon, a branch of Navaho canyon, and receives its name from a large spruce tree that formerly stood near by. The curved front wall of the structure measures 218 ft long; the breadth of the ruin is 80 ft, and its longest axis is about n. and s. This ruin has 114 secular rooms, 8 subterranean kivas, and a roofless kiva sometimes called a warriors' room. Many of the dwelling chambers are 3 stories high, several filling the interval from the floor to the roof of the cave. It is estimated that the population of Spruce-tree House was 350. The period of occupancy and the causes of depopulation are unknown, but there is no doubt that the buildings are prehistoric.

The kivas of Spruce-tree House as a rule are arranged at equal distances along the front of the cave; they average about 15 ft in diameter. They are circular or oval in form, and subterranean in position, their tops being level with the adjoining plazas. Entrance to kivas was gained probably by means of notched logs or ladders through hatchways in the roofs. There were also subterranean passageways communicating with neighboring plazas or rooms. Each kiva has a ventilator by which fresh air is introduced and distributed at the floor level, a central fireplace, and a small symbolic opening, or sipapu, in the floor, representing the entrance into the underworld. The roof is elaborately constructed in vaulted form, its beams being placed crosswise, the outer ones resting on six vertical pilasters, or pedestals, supported by a banquette surrounding the room and raised about 3 ft from the floor. The roof covering is cedar bark, and clay hardened by stamping.

The dwelling rooms are circular, rectangular, and triangular in form, arranged in rows or clusters near the kivas, generally inclosing plazas or dance places. Some of the rooms have fireplaces, doors, windows, and plastered floors. The roofs of several rooms are as well preserved as when first constructed. In the rear of the dwelling rooms are found storage places and granaries. Some of these back rooms had their entrances closed and sealed, and were used as ossuaries, or intramural receptacles for the dead, while the village was inhabited. In addition to the kivas there are two other rooms that may have served for ceremonial purposes; these have no pedestals or roof supports, and are not subterranean. The walls of both the kivas and the dwelling rooms are plastered, and decorated with colored designs, among the latter being representations of birds, mountain-sheep, butterflies, and rain-clouds.

In the rear of the ruin there are two large open spaces inclosed by walls of buildings. These are dark, and the floors were covered with debris containing many relics of the former inhabitants. A well-preserved mummy of an adult wrapped in cloth, in a sitting position, with knees brought to the chin, is said to have been found in this debris. There are also fragments of calcined human bones, indicating cremation. Three infants partially mummified and the skeleton of an adult were buried under the floor of one of the rooms. From the position of the skeletons it is supposed that intramural interments were made at different periods. Beautiful specimens of black-and-white pottery, fine cloth made of agave and cotton fibers, basketry, lignite gorgets, and stone and wooden objects have been found. The rooms of Spruce-tree House were cleaned out and their fallen walls repaired under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in 1908. All the rooms were numbered and labeled, and appropriate explanations of doubtful structures provided. There are several fine groups of pictographs and two ancient stairways cut into the cliffs in its vicinity.

Squam. One of the aboriginal divisions of Nantucket id., Mass.—Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., III, 25-26, 1815.

Squamish. The name given by the Canadian Department of Indian Affairs to that portion of the Squawmish living on Howe sd., Brit. Col. Pop. 31 in 1909. Shw-aw-mish.—Can. Ind. Aff., 276, 1894 (probably a misprint) Skw-amish.—Ibid., 358, 1895. Skwaw-mish.—Ibid., 308, 1879. Squamish.—Ibid., 195, 1885.

Squamscot. A part of the Pennacook confederacy, called a tribe, which formerly lived on Exeter r., probably about the present site of Exeter, Rockingham co., N. H.—Potter in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 222, 1856.

Squando. An Abnaki sachem of the Sokoki, known generally as the "Sagamore of Saco." He was credited with seeing visions and was called by Mather "a strange, enthusiastical sagamore." His wife and child had been insulted by the English, and he took part in the war of 1675-76 and in the burning of Saco. He signed the treaty of Cocheco. (A. F. C.)

Squannaroo (Yakima: Skwánānā, 'whirlpool'). A body of Indians, numbering 120 persons, found by Lewis and Clark in 1805 on Cataract r., Wash., n. of the Big Narrows. According to Mooney they are a division of the Pisuows, and their Yakima name refers strictly to a point on Yakima r. about opposite the entrance to Selah cr., their village being on the w. bank of the river. The same authority states also that they may possibly speak the language of the Atanumlema, a neighboring Shahaptian tribe.

Lower Yakima.—Lewis and Clark quoted by Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 417, 1855. Skwa'nānā.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 736, 1896. Spear-maros.—Robertson (1816) in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 30th Cong., 1st sess., 9, 1848. Squam-a-cross.—Lewis and Clark quoted by Stevens in Ind. Aff. Rep., 460, 1854. Squam-a-ross.—Lewis and Clark quoted by Gibbs, op. cit. Squan-nan-os.—Lewis and Clark Exped., Coues ed., 958, 1893. Squannaroos.—Lewis and Clark Exped., II, 595, 1817. Squannor-oss.—Ibid., I, map, 1817. Squan-nun-os.—Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, IV, 307, 1905.

Squantersquash. An early name for the squash, the latter word being a reduction of the longer one; spelled also "squontersquash." See Squash. (A. F. C.)

Squanto. A Wampanoag (Drake, Inds. of N. Am., 69, 1880) who is said to have been the only person in Patuxet that escaped the plague of 1619. He was a friend of the English, and did them much service besides acting as interpreter and guide, though he seems to have been also at one time the agent or spy of Caunbitant, sachem of Mattapoissett. He died at Chatham in 1622. The name Squanto was contracted from Tisquantum. (A. F. C.)

Squantum. A word still in use in parts of New England in the sense of a merry-making, a picnic, a shore dinner, a good time, a high old time, or the like. Osgood (New Eng., 61, 1883) states: "The squantum is a peculiar institution of this island [Nantucket], being an informal picnic on the beach sands, where the dinner is made of fish and other spoils of the sea." Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 1877), says, "probably from Indian place-names (Squantum), as in or near Quincy, Mass." The place name Squantum is said to be derived from Tisquantum, or Tasquantum, the appellation of a Massachusetts Indian, generally known to the settlers about Plymouth as Squantum or Squanto (q. v.). In all probability the word goes back to this personal name in the Massachusetts dialect of Algonquian, signifying 'door,' 'entrance,' like the cognate Delaware eshkande, Chippewa ishkwandem, Nipissing ishkwandem or ishkwand, and Cree iskwātem. (A. F. C.)

Squash. The common name of several species of the genus Cucurbita. These vegetables were cultivated by the Algonquian Indians of N. E. North America before the coming of the whites, who inherited both thing and name. Roger Williams (Key to Lang. of Amer., 103, 1643) says: "Askutasquash, their vine-apples, which the English from them call squashes." Josselyn (N. E. Rarities, 57, 1672) speaks of "squashes . . . more truly squontersquashes, a kind of melon, or rather gourd." Wood (N. E. Prospect, 761, 1634) says of the aborigines of Massachusetts that "in summer, when their corne is spent, 'Isquontersquashes' is their best bread, a fruit like a young Pumpion." Eliot (1663) in his Bible renders "cucumbers" by askoot-asquash, which is the Massachusetts form of the Narraganset word cited by Williams. Squashes were so spoken of by the Indians because, as some of the early chroniclers remarked, "you may eat them green, and never after they are ripe." Askutasquash signifies literally 'vegetables eaten green,' inan. pl. of askutasq; from the root ask (1) 'to be green,' (2) 'to be raw,' (3) 'to be immature.' From the squash have been named: Squash-beetle (Diabrotica vittata), squash-vine borer (Trochilium cucurbitæ), squash-bug (Anasa tristis), Hubbard squash, crookneck squash, summer squash, winter squash, squash gourd, squash melon, squash vine, etc. (A. F. C. W. R. G.)

Squash. A name mentioned by Buffon, and by Webster on the authority of Goldsmith, as that of the brown coat, Nasua narica. The word is a corruption of the Tupi (South American) name of the animal. (W. R. G.)

Squaw. An Indian woman. From Narraganset squaw, probably an abbreviation of eskwa, cognate with the Delaware ochqueu, the Chippewa ikwé, the Cree ikuer, etc. As a term for woman squaw has been carried over the length and breadth of the United States and Canada, and is even in use by Indians on the reservations of the W., who have taken it from the whites. After the squaw have been named: Squawberry (the partridge berry), squaw bush (in various parts of the country, Cornus stolonifera, C. sericea, and C. canadensis), squaw carpet (a California name of Ceanothus prostratus), squaw fish (a species of fish found in the N. W.), squaw flower (Trillium erectum, called also squaw root), squaw man (an Indian who does woman's work; also a white man married to an Indian woman and living with her people), squaw mint (the American pennyroyal), squawroot (in different parts of the country, Trillium erectum, the black and the blue cohosh, Conopholis americana, and other plants), squaw sachem (a term in vogue in the era of New England colonization for a female chief among the Indians), squaw vine (a New England name for the partridge berry), squawweed (Erigeron philadelphicus and Senecio aureus), squaw winter (a term in use in parts of the Canadian N. W. to designate a mild beginning of winter). A species of duck (Harelda glacialis) is called old squaw. (A. F. C.)

Squawkeag ('red earth or land.'—Hewitt). A tribe or band formerly occupying a considerable territory on both banks of Connecticut r., in Franklin co., Mass. Their principal village, of the same name, was near the present Northfield. Some of them were still there in 1688.

Squagkecke.—Courtland (1688) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., III, 562, 1863. Squaheag.—Rowlandson (ca. 1676) quoted by Drake, Trag. Wild., 32, 1841. Squakeage.—Winthrop (1664) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Hist., XIII, 511, 1881. Squakheig.—Writer of 1676 quoted by Drake, Ind. Chron., 123, 1836. Squakkeag.—Drake, Bk. Inds., III, 31, 1848. Squawkeague.—Hubbard (1792) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., II, 30, 1810. Squawkeag.—Sewall (1688), ibid., 4th s., VIII, 519, 1868.

Squawkihow (the Iroquois adaptation of Muskwaki, the Fox name for themselves; the m-sound not occurring in the phonetic elements of the Iroquois tongues; there was left squawkie, commonly pronounced skwahkiha by the Iroquois. The signification of Muskwaki is 'red earth,' and it may have been originally employed in contradistinction to Osaunki or Osaunki, 'yellow earth,' the base of the tribal name Sauk). A colony of immigrant and captive Fox Indians, who dwelt, when first known, at Gathsegwarohare (Gaghegwalahala, Cassawauloughly, Gaghaheywarahera, Gathseowalohare, etc.), a village consisting of about 25 cabins, situated on the E. side of Canaseraga cr., 2 m. from its confluence with Genesee r., N. Y., and therefore only a few miles S. of Genesee (Chenussio), the principal town of the Seneca. With its extensive fields of corn, and gardens of beans, squashes, and tobacco, it was destroyed, Sept. 14, 1779, by the army of Gen. Sullivan. The importance of this colony of "Squagh-kie Indians" may be inferred from the fact that at the Niagara treaty negotiated by Col. Butler in 1776 they figured as a separate nation."

In 1652-53, immediately after the dispersion and political extinction of the Hurons, the Tionontati, and the Neutrals in 1648-51, the Iroquois while in pursuit of the fugitive remnants of these people extended their western sphere of action to the region around L. Michigan. The result of this was to bring them into contact with the Fox (Muskwaki) Indians among others, a part of whom later became involved in war with the French and the surrounding tribes. This state of affairs brought about a quasi-alliance between the isolated Fox tribe and the English, and the allies of the latter, the Iroquois. In the subsequent struggle between the French and the Indian tribes under their protection on the one hand and the Fox tribe on the other, the latter were finally overpowered and severely chastised. "The destruction of two Mascoutin and Ottagamie [Muskwaki] villages is one of the principal reasons which induces me to send this express canoe," wrote Du Buisson, the French commander at Detroit, in 1712. "They received many presents," he continued, "and some belts from the English, to destroy the post of Ft Pontchartrain [Detroit], and then to cut our throats and those of our allies, particularly the Hurons and Ottawas, residing upon Detroit r.; and after that these wretches intended to settle among the English and devote themselves to their service. It is said that the band of Oninetonam and that of Mucatemangona have been received among the Iroquois and have established a village upon their lands. This information has been brought by three canoes of Outagamis." (Wis. Hist. Coll., xvi, 268, 1902.) Some time in the 80's Dr M. H. Mills communicated to the Rochester (N. Y.) Union a tradition that identifies the "Squawkiehah Indians" with the Sauk and Fox (Conover, Kanadesaga and Geneva MS.).

There are many references showing conclusively that the Iroquois and the Foxes on the one hand were making common cause against the French and their allies on the other, and it is also learned that in 1741 the Foxes had an understanding with the Iroquois that if the Foxes should be compelled to leave their villages, they could find a safe asylum among the Iroquois. The confused and untrustworthy statements concerning the Squawkihow and the Missisauga (Twakanha) Indians made by David Cusick in his History of the Six Nations (1828) have misled most authors who have attempted to identify the Squawkihow. Thus, Macauley (Hist. N. Y., 180, 1829) identifies them with the Shawnee, and says that the Squawkihow inhabited the banks of Genesee r. before the Seneca and the Erie possessed the country. In Butler's Niagara treaty with various Indian tribes the "Squaghkie" Indians figured as a separate tribe, as above mentioned.

For 16 m. below Portage, N. Y., the channel of Genesee r. lies at the bottom of a deep gorge whose banks in some places rise nearly 700 ft, and in the town of Leicester, Livingston co., the stream breaks forth from the side of the mountain cliff. This opening in the valley, forming a striking feature of the landscape, was called by the Seneca Indians Dayoitgao (Deioitgēn' 'on', 'there it issues'). In the spring of 1780, Guy Johnson, in assigning the dispersed Iroquois tribes new homes, placed the dependent Squawkihow on the w. side of Genesee r., at Dayoitgao, near the present Mt Morris, and it is this place that has retained the name "Squawkie Hill." Squeteague. The weakfish (Otolithus regalis), a very useful species of fish, since its flesh, which is rich and gelatinous when fresh, affords a delicate article of food, while from its swimming bladder can be made an excellent fish glue or isinglass. The latter fact was discovered by the Narraganset, who used the "sounds" of the fish for making a glutinous substance which they used for the same purpose for which glue would be employed, hence the name pēsākweteauaq, 'they make glue' (the subject of the verb being the "sounds" of the fish taken as animate), contracted to p's'kwēteauag, s'kwēteauag, and skwēteague. Among other spellings of the name are squettee, squiteeg, squitie, succoteague, skwiteague, scuteeg, and squit. (W. R. G.)

Stagilanas (Stā'gi lā'nas, 'Stā'gi town-people'). A Haida family of the Eagle clan. It was one of those of Ninstints (Gunghet-haidagai), and is said to have been part of the Gunghet-kegawai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 272, 1905.

Stahchani (Staxēha'ni, 'this side of the ear or cliff.'—Teit). A Ntlakyapamuk village on the e. side of Fraser r., Brit. Col., between Keefer's station and Cisco. Stataia'ni.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 5, 1899. Staxēha'ni.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., ii, 169, 1900.

Stahlouk. A former band of Salish, probably Cowichan, of Fraser superintendency, Brit. Col.—Can. Ind. Aff., 138, 1879.

Staitan. "Staitan or Kite Indians," mentioned by Lewis and Clark in 1804 as one of the small tribes about whom little more than the name was known, roving on the heads of Platte and Cheyenne rs. The narrative continues: "They have acquired the name of Kites from their flying—that is, their being always on horseback, and the smallness of their numbers is to be attributed to their extreme ferocity; they are the most warlike of all the western Indians; they never yield in battle; they never spare their enemies; and the retaliation of this barbarity has almost extinguished the nation." They are estimated at 40 lodges, 100 warriors, 400 souls. They are elsewhere represented as neighbors and friends of the Cheyenne and the Kanenavish (Arapaho).

They are probably the Sutaio (q. v.), formerly a distinct tribe, but now incorporated with the Cheyenne. The Cheyenne form for 'Sūtai man' would be Sūtai'itā'n, pl. Sūtai'-itā'neo. They are not the Crows, as has sometimes been supposed from the coincidence of the name Kites, neither are they identical with the Cheyenne as Mooney at one time supposed (Ghost Dance, 1023, 1896). By careless copying, the name appears also as Stactan, Stailan, and even Marlain; but the original and only authority rests with Lewis and Clark. (J. M.)

Standing Bear (Moⁿ-chu-noⁿ-zhiⁿ). A Ponca chief of whom little was known until the removal of his people from n. Nebraska to Indian Ter. because the reservation confirmed to them by treaty had been included in the land granted to the Sioux. When the order for removal was given, Jan. 15, 1877, Standing Bear strongly opposed it, but in February he and nine other chiefs were taken s. to choose a reservation. They followed the official, but would not select a place. Their wearisome journey brought them to Arkansas City, Kans., whence they asked to be taken home; being refused, they started back afoot, with a few dollars among them and a blanket each. In 40 days they had walked 500 m., reaching home Apr. 2, to find the official there unwilling to listen to protests and determined to remove the people. He called the military, and the tribe, losing hope, abandoned their homes in May. Standing Bear could get no response to his demand to know why he and his people were arrested and treated as criminals when they had done no wrong.

The change of climate brought great suffering to the Ponca; within the year a third of the tribe had died and most of the survivors were ill or disabled. A son of Standing Bear died. Craving to bury the lad at his old home, the chief determined to defy restraint. He took the bones of his son and with his immediate following turned northward in Jan. 1879, and in March arrived destitute at the Omaha res. Asking to borrow land and seed, his request was granted, and the Ponca were about to put in a crop when soldiers appeared with orders to arrest Standing Bear and his party and return them to Indian Ter. On their way they camped near Omaha, where Standing Bear was interviewed by T. H. Tibbles, a newspaper correspondent, and accounts of their grievances appearing in the Omaha newspapers, the citizens became actively interested and opened a church where to a crowded house the chief repeated his story. Messrs Poppleton and Webster proffered legal services to the prisoners and in their behalf sued out a writ of habeas corpus. The United States denied the prisoners' right to the writ on the ground that they were "not persons within the meaning of the law." On

Apr. 18 Judge Dundy decided that "an Indian is a person within the meaning of the law of the United States," and therefore had a right to the writ when restrained in violation of law; that "no rightful authority exists for removing by force any of the prisoners to the Indian Territory," and therefore, "the prisoners must be discharged from custody."

Standing Bear and his band returned to n. Nebraska. In the winter of 1879-80, accompanied by Susette La Flesche ("Bright Eyes," q. v.) and Francis La Flesche, as interpreters, with T. H. Tibbles, Standing Bear visited the cities of the E., where, by relating his story of the wrongs suffered, he won attention and sympathy. Many people wrote to the President and to other executive officials of the Government, and to members of Congress, protesting against unjust treatment of Indians. In the spring of 1880 the Senate appointed a committee to investigate the Ponca removal, the report of which confirmed the story of Standing Bear, and a satisfactory adjustment was effected. Better lands were given those Ponca who chose to remain in Indian Ter.; payment was made to all who had lost property, and a home was provided for Standing Bear and his followers at their old reservation. Here, in Sept. 1908, after having been instrumental in bringing about a change of Governmental policy toward all Indians and their homes, the chief died at the age of 79 and was buried among the hills overlooking the village site of his ancestors. Standing Peach Tree. A former Cherokee settlement on Chattahoochee r., at the mouth of Peachtree cr., n. w. of Atlanta, Ga.—Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1887.

Standing Stone. A famous Indian landmark on the right bank of a creek of the same name, on the Kittanning trail, at the site of the present Huntingdon, Huntingdon co., Pa. The "standing stone" is described by John Harris (1754) as being 14 ft high and 6 in. square, and covered with Indian pictographs. It was highly venerated by the Indians, and is supposed to have been erected by one of the tribes of the Iroquois. After the treaty of 1754 the stone was carried away by the Indians. A similar one was erected on the same spot, which soon became covered with the names and initials of the Indian traders who passed by.

Conrad Weiser, in his mission to the Ohio Indians at Logstown in 1748, passed near the place, which he mentions in his Journal as "the Standing Stone" (Col. Rec., Pa., v, 348, 1851). There is no evidence that this place was ever the site of an Indian settlement. Many Indian objects have been found in the vicinity of the "standing stone," which may have been a meeting place of the Indians after returning from their raids and hunts. A settlers' fort was begun at the locality in 1762, but was abandoned soon after the commencement of the Indian hostilities, when all the settlers in that region fled Carlisle. At the beginning of the Revolution this fort was rebuilt. In 1778 it was a meeting place for the Tories of Sinking valley, on their way to Kittanning, who, according to various letters from the frontier, "drove away the inhabitants of Standing Stone town" (Frontier Forts of Pa., I, 584, 1895). The only "Indian massacre" near Standing Stone was on June 19, 1777, at the Big Spring, some miles w. of the fort, when a band of hostile Indians killed a boy named Donnelly. The inhabitants during this period were in a constant state of alarm, and frequently fled to the various posts for protection from the Indians.

Rev. Dr William Smith, provost of the University of Pennsylvania, laid out a town on the site of Standing Stone in 1767, to which he gave the name of Huntingdon, in honor of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon (England), who had made a gift to the university. The old name, however, clung to the place for years afterward. Nearly all the traders and military officers of the 18th century use the old name. It is marked "Standing Stone" on Lewis Evans' maps of 1755 and 1770; "Standing Stone, Huntington," on the Pownall map of 1776. For other references see Egle, Hist. Pa., 779, 1883; Walton's Conrad Weiser, 186, 1900. (G. P. D.)

Stand Watie (native name De'gāld'gā, conveying the meaning that two persons are standing together so closely united in sympathy as to form but one human body). A noted Cherokee Indian, son of Uweti and brother of Elias Boudinot (q. v.), and after his death a leader of the party which had signed the removal treaty of New Echota. On the outbreak of the Civil War he and his party were the first to ally themselves with the South, and he was given command of one of two Cherokee regiments which joined the Confederate forces and participated in the battle of Pea Ridge and in other actions. Later he led his regiment back to Indian Ter., and in conjunction with Confederate sympathizers from other tribes laid waste the fields and destroyed the property of the Indians who espoused the Federal cause. In revenge for the death of his brother he burned the house of John Ross, the head chief. He is further noted as one of the principal authorities for the legends and other material collected by Schoolcraft among the Cherokee. See Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 1900.

Staria Selenie (Russian: 'old settlement'). A Chnagmiut Eskimo village on the lower Yukon, Alaska. Pop. 55 in 1880.

Starie Selenie.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 12, 1884. Staria Selenie.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 57, 1880.

Starik (Russian: 'old'). A Chnagmiut Eskimo village on the s. bank of Yukon r., Alaska, above the head of the delta. Pop. 90 in 1880.

Starnatan. A village on the St Lawrence, just below the site of Quebec, in 1535.—Cartier (1535), Bref. Récit., 32, 1863.

Stasaos-kegawai (Stasa'os qē'gawa-i, 'those born on the Stasaos coast'). A Haida family of the Raven clan who were in the habit of camping on the n. side of the w. entrance of Skidegate channel, and were so called from the name of the shore there (Stasaos). They were probably a subdivision of the Hlgahetgu-lanas. A minor division of the Stasaos-kegawai was called Gunghet-kegawai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 270, 1905.

Stasausk'e'owai.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., sec. II, 24, 1898.

Stasao8-lanas (Stasa'os lä'nas, 'people of Stasao8 coast'). A Haida family of the Eagle clan that received its name from a strip of coast along the n. side of the channel between the largest two of the Queen Charlotte id., Brit. Col. Probably they were originally a part of the Kaiahl-lanas, with whom they used to go about.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 274, 1905.

Stashum (Sta-shum). A former Lummi village on Waldron id., Wash.—Gibbs, Clallam and Lummi, 39, 1863.

Statannyik (Stä'tannyik, 'many ants'). A Pima village on the s. bank of the Gila, s. Ariz., between Vaaki (Casa Blanca) and Huchiltchik. It may be identical with Hormiguero (q. v.).

Stä'tannyik—Russell in 26th Rep. B. A. E., 23, 1908. Staw-to-nik.—Dudley in Ind Aff. Rep. 1871, 68, 1872. Statonik.—ten Kate cited by Gatschet, MS., B. A. E., xx, 199, 1888.

Stature. See Anatomy.

Stawas-haidagai (St'awä's xä'idaga-i, 'witch people'). A Haida family of the Eagle clan. While these people were living near the Kogahl-lanas the screech-owls (st'ao) were heard to call so much from their side of the creek that a boy in the town opposite said they ought to be called 'Witch people' (St'awä's xä'idaga-i). This story was probably told to alleviate the application of a rather harsh name. They had the same traditional origin as the Kona-kegawai, Djiguashl-lanas, and Kaiahl-lanas. All of them lived in the town of Cumshewa, which was owned by their chief. There were three local subdivisions, the Heda-haidagai, Sa-haidagai, and Kahligua-haidagai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 273, 1905.

Steatite. A soft, tough, talcose rock, commonly called soapstone, occurring in massive bodies in connection with other metamorphic rocks, and much used by the Indian tribes N. of Mexico for implements, utensils, and ornaments. It was employed for the manufacture of cooking utensils because of its resistance to the destructive action of fire, and for various minor utensils and ornaments because readily carved with stone tools and susceptible of a high polish. The color is usually a somewhat greenish gray, but when polished and subjected to long-continued handling it becomes almost black, presenting an attractive appearance. This material is of very general distribution. It occurs in numberless places in the Appalachian highland, extending into New England, New Brunswick, and Canada in the n. and into the Gulf states in the s. (see Mines and Quarries). Deposits occur in Wyoming and other states along the Great Divide, and in California it was extensively mined, especially on Santa Catalina id., off the coast of Santa Barbara co (Schumacher, Holmes). It is in general use among the Eskimo, some of their sources of supply being Cumberland ed., Wagerr., and Greenland. Steatite was quarried from the massive deposits by means of stone picks and chisels, and the various shapes were roughed out with the same implements, many of which were left on the quarry sites and on dwelling sites where the utensils were specialized. The implements used in carving were probably hafted, but the manner of hafting is unknown. In the United States a common form of soapstone utensils was a heavy oblong basin, from a few inches to 20 or more in length, about half as wide, and a few inches in depth, having rudely carved projections at the ends for handles. These crude vessels are believed to have been used for cooking. In this section the material was in general use for various minor carvings, and especially for tobacco pipes, many elaborate and tasteful examples of which have been obtained from ancient mounds and village sites. In California steatite was employed in the manufacture of utensils of many kinds, notably the globular ollas of the southern part of the state, baking plates, tobacco pipes, personal ornaments, fetiches, and various objects of unknown use. In the Arctic regions it is of the greatest value to the Eskimo, by whom it is used in making lamps. On account of the ease with which this material is carved it has been freely used in the manufacture of imitations of the aboriginal work, and fraudulent specimens are frequently offered for sale. See Chisels, Mines and Quarries, Picks, Stone-work.

Stetuk (Stētūqk). A Squawmish village community on Burrard inlet, Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 475, 1900.

Stiahta. See Roundhead.

Stick Indians (from stick, meaning 'tree,' or 'wood,' in the Chinook jargon). A term universally applied by certain N. W. Coast tribes to any Indians from the interior; that is, to those who live back in the woods. It is more commonly used on the coasts of Alaska and British Columbia to refer to the Athapaskan tribes E. of the Coast range, but it was used also by the Chinook and other Oregon and Washington tribes to designate the Salish and Shahaptian tribes of Columbia r. and Puget sd. Stikayi (Stiká'yí). The name of three distinct Cherokee settlements: (1) on Sticoa cr., near Clayton, Rabun co., Ga.; (2) on Tuckasegee r., at the old Thomas homestead, just above the present Whit-tier, in Swain co., N. C.; (3) on Stekoa cr. of Little Tennessee r., a few miles below the junction of Nantahala, in Graham co., N. C. The word has lost its meaning. It is variously spelled Stecoe, Steecoy, Stekoah, Stickoey, etc.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 532, 1900.

Steecoy.—Doc. of 1755 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 143, 1887. Stekoa.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., map 54, 1899. Sticcoa.—Royce in 5th Rep., op. cit., map.

Stikine. A Tlingit tribe on and near the mouth of the river which bears its name. Pop. 1,300 in 1840, 317 in 1880, 255 in 1890. Their wintertown is Katchanaak (Wrangell); their ancient village was Kahlteatlan (Old Wrangell). Shake's Village, Shallyany's Village, and Shus-tak's Village are also mentioned. The following social divisions are found here: Hehlkoan, Hokedi, Kaskakoedi, Katchadi, Kayashkidetan, Kiksadi, Nanyaayi, Siknahadi, Tahlkoedi, and Tihittan.

Stlenga-lanas (Stl'e'ña la'nas, 'rear town people'). A great Haida family of the Raven clan living along the N. coast of the Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. According to tradition they received their name from having occupied the row of houses farthest back from the coast in the legendary town of Skena. It seems more likely that they became a separate family while at Naikun. There were several subdivisions, the Dostlan-Inagai, Aostlan-Inagai, Teestlan-Inagai, and Yagunstan-Inagai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 271, 1905. Stl'enge lá'nas.—Bass, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 22, 1898. Stling Lennas.—Harrison in Proc. Roy. Soc. Can., ser. 11, 124, 1895.

Stlep (St'lep, 'home country'). An abandoned Chilliwack village on upper Chilliwack r., Brit. Col.; so called because the old communal houses of the tribe were situated there.—Hill-Tout in Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1902.

Stlindagwai (Stl'í'ndagwa-i, 'the village deep in the inlet'). A Haida town of the Hagi-lanas family in an inlet on the W. coast of Moresby id., not far from Houston Stewart channel, Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Sto. For all references beginning with this abbreviation, see Santo.

co., Mass. Their principal village, Westenhuck, was for a long time the capital of the Mahican after the removal of the council fire from Schodac. They had another village at Skatehook. In 1734 Sergeant began missionary work among them, and two years later the several bands were collected on a tract reserved for their use by the Colonial government. After the village of Stockbridge was established they were known as Stockbridge Indians. The French and Indian war, which broke out in 1754, proved disastrous to the Stockbridges. Many of them joined the English army and their town suffered from marauding parties, so that at the close of the war there were only about 200 remaining. The whites were also closing in around them, and in 1785 the dispirited remnant, accepting an invitation of the Oneida, removed to a tract on Oneida cr. in Madison and Oneida cos., N. Y., where a new village sprang up (see Stockbridge, above). The removal required two years. Under the protection of the Oneida the Stockbridges again increased, and in 1796 numbered 300. In 1833, with the Oneida and Munsee, they removed to a tract at the head of Green bay, Wis., which had been purchased from the Menominee. Here they became incorporated with the Munsee, and the two tribes have since formed one body. From the time of their leaving New York the tribe has divided on questions in regard to land and citizenship. After interminable negotiations with the state and national governments the matter is still unsettled. In 1839 the Stockbridges and Munsee, then numbering about 420, sold half of their reservation and agreed to remove to lands that were to be assigned to them w. of the Mississippi. On the remaining land a town was laid out, on the E. shore of Winnebago lake, where it was intended to settle such as desired to become citizens. About 80 removed to the Missouri r. and remained for a time near Leavenworth, Kans. The arrangement proved unsatisfactory, and they were once more brought together and the tribal government restored. In 1856 they removed, with the exception of a number who desired to become citizens, to a reservation w. of Shawano, Shawano co., Wis., where in 1909 the united tribes, including the Munsee, numbered 582 souls. There are also some who have become citizens near their former home on Winnebago lake.

Stonework. Primitive men doubtless first used stones in their natural form for throwing, striking, and abrading; but as use continued, a certain amount of adventitious shaping of the stones employed necessarily took place, and this probably suggested and led to intentional shaping. Men early learned to fracture brittle stones to obtain cutting, scraping, and perforating implements; and flaking, pecking, cutting, scraping, and grinding processes served later to modify shapes and to increase the convenience, effectiveness, and beauty of implements. Much has been learned of the course of progress in the stone-shaping arts from the prehistoric remains of Europe, and studies of the work of the native American tribes, past and present, are supplying data for a much more complete understanding of this important branch of primitive activity. It is not believed that the course of events in the development of art in stone was uniform with all peoples, for the materials available in the different countries are so unlike that uniformity would be quite out of the question. It may be reasonably assumed, however, that with average lithic resources the simpler processes and those giving required results most directly would take precedence, and the more complex processes—those requiring higher intelligence and greater skill—would follow. In America, although there has doubtless been, generally speaking, progress from simpler to more complex conditions of stone art, no definite separation of an early and a late, a paleolithic and a neolithic, a chipped and a polished stone age, has been recognized. See Neolithic age, Paleolithic implements.

The Americans N. of Mexico were still well within the stone stage of culture. Metal had come somewhat into use, but in no part of the country had it taken in a very full measure the place of stone. According to the most approved views regarding Old World culture history the metal age was not definitely ushered in until bronze and iron came into common use, not only as shaping implements but as shaped product. With stone implements the more cultured tribes of middle America had constructed handsome buildings and executed sculptures of a high order of merit, but N. of Mexico the results were of a much less pretentious kind. Only one group of tribes, the Pueblos, had made intelligent and extensive use of stone in building (see Architecture, Cliff dwellings, Habitations, Pueblos), although the mound-builders, the Eskimo, and others employed it for this purpose in a limited way. Numerous tribes, however, had entered the field of sculpture, especially as applied to the shaping of objects of utility and common use; but the work extended also to the shaping of personal ornaments and of symbolic objects connected with religious beliefs and ceremonies. See Sculpture.

No extensive region in America is without stone of one or more varieties, and the resources usually are varied and vast. The raw materials were obtained from the surface supply, or, where that was not available in sufficient quantities, they were quarried from the beds in place. See Mines and Quarries.

The varieties employed by the primitive tribes are very numerous, and being of special interest in this connection the following are briefly described under separate heads: Actinolite, agate (chalcedony), alabaster (gypsum), amber, andesite, argillite, basalt, calcite, cannel coal (jet), catlinite, chalcedony, chert (chalcedony), chlorite, flint, granite, gypsum, hematite, iron, jade (nephrite), jasper, jet, lignite (jet), limonite (hematite), marble, mica, muscovite (mica), nephrite, novaculite, obsidian, onyx (marble), pectolite, porphyry, pyrites, quartz, quartzite, rhyolite, schist, selenite (gypsum), serpentine, sienite, slate, soapstone (steatite), stalactite (marble), stalagmite (marble), steatite, talc (steatite), trachyte, travertine (marble), turquoise, utahlite.

The processes employed in shaping these materials by the American tribes, and, for that matter, by the whole primitive world, are: (1) fracturing processes, variously known as breaking, spalling, chipping, flaking; (2) crumbling processes, as battering, pecking; (3) incising or cutting processes; (4) abrading processes, as sawing, drilling, scraping, and grinding, and (5) polishing processes. The implements used in or connected with the shaping work are described separately under the following heads: Abrading implements, Anvils, Arrowheads, Arrows, Bows, and Quivers; Chisels, Drills and Drilling, Flaking implements, Hammers, Knives, Pecking implements, Picks, Polishing implements, Saws, Scrapers.

Of later years the operation of the primitive stone-shaping processes has received much attention on the part of archeologists, and the mystery formerly surrounding some of them has been well cleared away. Implements of stone and bone in skilled hands are demonstrated to be as effective in shaping stone as bronze or iron, and the methods most commonly employed by the tribes may be briefly outlined.

Implements shaped by the chipping or flaking processes present a wide range of size, form, and finish, and include principally arrowheads, spearheads, lance heads, harpoon heads, knives, scrapers, drills, hoes, spades, and unspecialized blades.

These objects are largely leaf-shaped or were specialized from leaf-shaped blades, and the getting out of these blades was one of the most arduous and difficult tasks undertaken by the native artisan. In shaping the blades a suitable piece of brittle stone, preferably a flattish pebble, boulder, flake, or fragment was selected, and with a hammerstone of proper weight, usually globular or discoidal in form and generally not hafted, chips were removed by means of vigorous blows about the periphery, alternating the faces. The utmost skill of the operator was exerted to cause the flakes to carry from the point of percussion near the edge across and beyond the middle of the sides of the stone; failure in this resulted in the formation of a high ridge or node on one or both faces of the blade, which effectually prevented the proper development of the form.

If breakage or imperfect fracture did not intervene, the skilled workman in a few moments had roughed out a leaf-like blade of requisite thinness, and when the work had proceeded as far as convenient with the hammerstone, if further elaboration were desired, the pressure implement, usually a bit of hard bone or antler, suitably hafted, was resorted to. By means of strong, abrupt pressure at the proper points, first on one side and then on the other, the flakes were detached, margins were trimmed, stems formed, notches made, points sharpened, and the specialization completed. Utilizing flakes or fragments of suitable shape, the smaller projectile points, drills, scrapers, and knife blades could be completed in a few minutes, but the difficulty increased with increase in size. The larger blades, some of which are upward of 2 ft in length, required skill of a high order for their successful elaboration. In making small implements from fragments of proximate form, such as flakes or spalls, the hammer is not required, the work being readily accomplished with the bone point. It is to be observed, however, that the pressure flaker is available only with brittle stone and on forms having rather thin and sharp edges. Fracture processes varied much in detail from those here sketched.

FLAKING WITH BONE OR METAL POINT, USING A REST

In some cases the flakes were removed by setting a punch-like implement upon the proper point and striking it with a mallet, and the larger work was accomplished by means of strong leverage or heavy strokes, the appliances being too vaguely described by those making the record to convey a clear conception of the operations. The manner of resting and holding the stone and the method of applying the percussion and pressure implements differed with the different tribes, but the principles involved are apparently about the same with all. The fracture processes served also to produce emergency implements of almost every class—axes, celts or hatchets, picks, adzes, gouges, hammers, etc.; and this is true not only with the more primitive tribes but with all peoples using stone in the arts. It may be further noted that the flaking hammer was often employed to rough out the forms of many implements, as celts, axes, and adzes, designed to be elaborated and finished by pecking and grinding. See Cores, Flakes, Flaking implements, Hammers.

Many varieties of stone can not be shaped by fracture or can be shaped only imperfectly, and the aborigines resorted to the process of battering or pecking to secure the desired results. It was formerly supposed that this was a very tedious work and that the shaping of a celt or an ax required much time, but the experiments of McGuire and others have shown that the work may be comparatively rapid and that by repeated blows of the hammerstone the toughest and hardest materials may readily be reduced to the desired shapes. Beginning with a boulder or fragment of proximate shape or with a form roughed out by flaking, the primitive operator attacked the surface, crumbling the parts to be removed by rapid blows, and continued the work until the shape was so far perfected as to be ready for the grinding and polishing processes which followed. This pecking work is the prototype of the bush-hammering and the machine-chisel work of the civilized stonecutter. The leading varieties of articles shaped in part or in whole by this process are celts, axes, adzes, gouges, mortars, pestles, various culinary utensils, pipes, ornamental and ceremonial objects, and sculptures generally. See Pecking implements.

Incising processes were much employed by the native tribes. Knives, chisels, and other edged tools of stone served to carve all the softer varieties, the most universally available of these being soapstone or steatite (q. v.). Others are cannel coal, lignite, chalk, serpentine, and calcite. Chisels or edged stone picks were used in cutting out masses of soapstone in the quarry and in shaping the vessels and other large objects made from them. See Chisels, Knives, Picks. Abrading and smoothing processes were also of first importance to the tribes in shaping and finishing articles of stone. These employed the various grinding, sawing, drilling, and polishing tools. Drilling with pointed and tubular drills was constantly resorted to, as in the making of tobacco pipes and certain forms of ornaments and ceremonial objects. See Abrading implements, Drills and Drilling, Polishing implements, Saws, Scrapers.

plements and utensils: Abrading implements, adzes, anchors, anvils; arrows, bows, and quivers; arrowheads, awls, axes, baking stones, boxes, celts, chisels, daggers, drills, flakes, flaking implements, gouges, hammers, hatchets, hoes and spades, knives, lamps, lances, metates, mortars, mullers, pestles, picks, pincers, pipes, polishing implements, cups, dishes, ladles, receptacles, saws, scrapers, sinkers, slings, spearheads, tomahawks, wedges; (3) Ornaments: Beadwork, gorgets, labrets, mosaics, pendants; (4) Ceremonial objects: Batons, masks, pipes; (5) Problematical objects: Banner-stones, bird-stones, boat-stones, cache disks and blades, cones, flaked stones (eccentric forms), footprint sculptures, hemispheres and spheres, hook stones, inscribed tablets, notched plates, pierced tablets, plummetts, perforated

Besides the shaped product above dealt with, the shaping of stone gives rise to another class of results of particular importance in the history of stone art and especially deserving of the attention of students who would intelligently discriminate stone-age phenomena. These are the various forms of rejectage of manufacture. In getting out stone where large bodies are dealt with, the first step is that of dividing the masses by heavy blows, and the resultant forms are blocks, fragments, and splinters of diversified shape and size. From these suitable pieces are selected for specialization; the remainder are refuse. When selected pieces are under treatment by percussive processes the blows of the hammer remove flakes, chips, and spalls, and these become refuse; when other portions are under treatment by pressure processes, minute flakes or chips are produced and become refuse. When a suitable mass of the material is selected from which to remove flakes designed for use as knives or other implements or for further elaboration, a nucleus or core results and this also becomes refuse (see cores). Again, the portion of stone in process of shaping and partly shaped often breaks under the blows of the hammer or the pressure of the flaking tool and the pieces become refuse; and still more notably the piece being shaped does not develop properly and becomes unmanageable under the hammer or pressure flaker, and, being irreparably faulty, is rejected and becomes refuse. The last-mentioned abortive forms or failures are varied in shape and may or may not resemble closely the final forms which it was intended they should take. The term "turtleback" is applied to such of these rejected forms as have a faceted upper surface and a smoother under surface, suggesting the carapace of a turtle. It is these rejected defective forms, showing as they do clear evidence of design, that have led to much misapprehension because ignorant persons have mistaken them for actual implements and have attempted to classify them as such, assigning them to particular uses or periods suggested by their form. The various classes of rejectage here described—fragments, splinters, flakes, chips, cores, fragments resulting from breakage of partly shaped forms, and unbroken abortive forms, as well as broken and abandoned hammerstones—are usually left on the shaping sites. In bulk this rejectage far exceeds that of the accepted product—the output proper of the shop work. Other processes, as pecking, cutting, and grinding, also result in rejectage, but not to an equal extent with the fracture process, and the rejectage is seldom especially noteworthy except on soapstone quarry sites, where much breakage occurred during the process of roughing out the larger utensils.

The knowledge acquired in recent years through experiments in stone-shaping processes has led unfortunately to the manufacture of fraudulent imitations of aboriginal implements and sculptures for commercial purposes, and so great is the skill acquired in some cases that it is exceedingly difficult to detect the spurious work; there is thus much risk in purchasing objects whose pedigree is not fully ascertained. See Pseudo-Indian.

Stonington. A former Pequot village in New London co., Conn. In 1825 there were 50 Indians there.

Stono. A tribe formerly residing in the neighborhood of the present Charleston, S. C., probably about Stono r. They may be identified with the Stalame of the French explorer Laudonnière in 1562, mentioned as confederated with Audusta (Edisto). In the English colonial documents the Stono and Westo are named together as at war with the Carolina settlers in 1664, 1669-71, and again in 1674, in consequence of raids made on them by the whites for the purpose of procuring slaves, but this association is due to nothing more perhaps than similarity between the names. If it actually existed, they must have retired among the Creeks along with the Westo (Yuchi). Consult Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 1884; Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, *Bull. B. A. Storage and Caching. The storage of articles and supplies appears to have been quite general throughout America, and the practice of caching, or hiding, things not less so. The extent of this custom indicates its ancient origin, a conclusion strengthened by the discovery of large deposits of articles of stone which in many instances show partial disintegration and other indications of great age. Hoards of stone axes have been found in New Jersey, ceremonial implements in Florida, tobacco pipes in Ohio, and leaf-shaped blades along the greater part of the Atlantic seaboard. Many authors have described the methods employed by the Indians in the storage and caching of things, the process often evidencing great ingenuity in concealment. The season, the temperature, the locality, and the time required to make a cache were important considerations. When time allowed, some things were sewed in skins and suspended on trees or hidden in hollow tree trunks; others were buried under shelving rocks or in carefully prepared holes in the ground. Owing to seasonal journeys of large numbers of persons in search of food or other supplies, many things had to be left behind which, because of their weight or bulk, would add to the difficulty of movement. Caching was resorted to in order to prevent the hidden things from being disturbed by wild beasts, stones often being piled over the cache; or, when the deposit was of food or clothing, fires were built in order that the ashes should hide surface indications and thus keep enemies from disturbing the deposit; or, in other cases, the sod was carefully removed and replaced after the cache was completed; or, if the land was sandy, water was poured over the surface to conceal indications of the ground having been disturbed. The term cache, from the French cache, 'to hide,' has been very generally adopted by the whites, who have not been slow to accept and practise this primitive method of hiding things intended to be reclaimed.

Martin Frobisher (1578), according to Dionesse Settle, found that the natives in Baffinland hid their provisions, "both fish and flesh, in great heaps of stone," a practice still generally followed in the frozen north. Jacques Cartier (1535) found the natives on the St. Lawrence to have vessels "as big as any butt or tun" in which to keep their fish that had been dried in the summer; these people are also said to have kept their corn in garrets on top of their houses. Pierre Biard refers in 1616 to winter storehouses in Canada wherein the natives kept smoked meat, roots, shelled acorns, peas, beans, etc., which they first put into sacks, and these in large pieces of bark that they then suspended from interlacing branches of two trees, so that neither rats nor dampness could injure them. Biard refers also to the corn he ate in going upstream, which the natives sought in secluded places where they had hidden it in little caches of birch-bark when they went down the river. The Jesuit Relations record many instances of this general habit, while on war, trading, and other expeditions, of caching food, to be used on the return journey. Many instances are related of the loss of caches by robbery, through forgetfulness of their locations, or through injury by weather, and of great suffering caused thereby.

Champlain, in 1603, spoke of pits dug in slopes of the seacoast to a depth of 5 or 6 ft, in which sacks made from plants and filled with grain were placed and covered with sand, "which keep as well as our granaries."

Formerly in Oregon, Washington, and British Columbia dried fish were stored by the Indians of Columbia and Fraser rs. in caches built of split cedar planks supported on the branches of trees far above the ground. The Kalispel cached their stores of dried berries on little islands in Pend d'Oreille lake. The berries were placed in reed bags and were protected from the weather by small log houses built over them (Grinnell). On the N. W. coast, according to Boas, clams taken from strings of cedar bark, on which they had been dried, were stored for future use. Lewis and Clark, in 1804, found at the falls of Columbia r. that dried fish were pounded between two stones and then placed in baskets made of grass and rushes and lined with salmon skin; the fish was then pressed down and covered with fishskins, each basket weighing from 90 to 100 pounds. They describe a cache on Missouri r. made by first removing the soil from a circle 20 in. across and then excavating a pit which was gradually enlarged to a diameter of 6 or 7 ft, having the form of a kettle; this hole was lined on the bottom and sides with sticks, and then filled with skins which it was desired to preserve, after which the sod was replaced and the surface made to appear as natural as possible. This is a typical method among the Plains Indians and Southwestern tribes. These explorers refer also to buying corn in ears from the Mandan, who dug it up in front of their lodges, where it had been buried the winter before.

The ancient Zuni are said by Mindeleff to have rolled up huge snowballs, which they melted in reservoirs to obtain water, their arid environment having taught them to use such an expedient to increase the supply. Chroniclers of the Coronado expedition refer to a habit of the Hopi of taking along with them, when crossing the desert, a number of women laden with water in gourds, which they buried along the way for use on the return journey.

The natives of the Pacific coast keep acorns in brush storehouses and store pine seeds in granaries on top of their houses. The Indians of this region make vessels of rushes, plastered inside and outside with piñon gum and pitch, for holding liquids and seeds. Thomas Hariot, in 1585, refers to the natives of Florida hardening their meat in smoke in order to "preserve the same for winter use." John Smith (1608) speaks of the Virginia Indians as drying their fish in the Spanish fashion, as was done in the West Indies. Smith refers also to dried walnuts, chestnuts, acorns, and chinquapins which the natives gathered in the winter and kept in great baskets. John Lawson (1714) speaks of "other sorts of cabins," which were without windows, that were used for granaries and for storing skins and other merchandise. The Southern Indians, according to the same authority, made cribs wherein they preserved their corn from injury; these were erected on posts and were daubed inside and outside with loam or clay, being tight enough to keep out the smallest vermin. Oysters and clams were dried on strings and stored for future use. Mesquite beans, piñon nuts, acorns, filberts, and hickory nuts in their respective habitats were stored in brush inclosures, which were presumably the originals of the slatted corncribs of the present day. The Gulf tribes built houses raised upon poles for the purpose of storing grain. All Plains Indians dry and store fruits and nuts of various sorts. The Pima bury watermelons in sand and make immense basketry cribs for storing grain, as do also the Apache, the Tarahumare, and other tribes of the S. W.

Stratten. The local name for a band of Salish of Fraser superintendency, Brit. Col.—Can. Ind. Aff. Rep., 79, 1878.

Straw Town. See Ondakai.

Struck-by-the-Bee (Palaneapape). The head-chief of the Yankton Sioux at the period of the relinquishment of their lands in 1859 and until his death; born at Yankton, S. Dak., Aug. 30, 1804, while Lewis and Clark were encamped there. Capt. Lewis, on learning that a male child had been born in the camp, sent for it, and, wrapping it in the Stars and Stripes, declared it to be "an American." Growing to manhood with the tradition of his christening upon him, Struck-by-the-Ree took great pride in his "Americanism," and was always a staunch friend of the whites. His greatest service was in 1862, during the time of the panic due to the outbreak and massacre in Minnesota, when, by his influence, he kept his tribe from joining the hostiles and actually threw a cordon of his warriors across South Dakota from Ft Randall to the Sioux as a barrier between the hostiles and the white settlements. He died July 29, 1888. (D. R.)

Stryne. A Ntlakyapamuk village on the w. side of Fraser r., 5 m. above Lytton, Brit. Col. Pop. 57 in 1901, the last time the name appears.

Stā-ai'-in.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 44, 1891. Sta'ien.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 172, 1900. Stain.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1899. Strain.—Teit, op. cit. Stryen.—Brit. Col. map, Ind. Aff., Victoria, 1872. Stryne.—Can. Ind. Aff., 164, 1901. Stryne-Nqakin.—Ibid., 418, 1898 (two town names combined). Stryne.—Ibid., 269, 1889. Stryne.—Ibid., 434, 1896. Styne Creek.—Teit, op. cit. (white men's name).

Stsababsh (S'tsa-babsh). A Salish band living among the Dwamish lakes, Wash.—Boulet in letter, B. A. E., Mar. 22, 1886.

Stsanges (Stsd'nges). A Songish band between Esquimalt and Beecher bay, s. end of Vancouver id. Pop. 103 in 1904, 96 in 1909. Songish, the name given to this tribe by whites, is corrupted from the name of this band.

Songhees.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. II, 164, 1901. Stsd'nges.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 17, 1890.

Stakeitl (Stsk'ē'il). A Bellacoola town on the s. side of Bellacoola r., Brit. Col., near its mouth. It is one of the 8 villages called Nuhalk.

Stakē'etl.—Boas in 7th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 3, 1891. Stak'ē'il.—Boas in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 49, 1898.

Stthukhwich. A Siuslaw village on Siuslaw r., Oreg.

St'cu'-qwi'to.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 230, 1890.

Stucabitic. A Maricopa rancheria on the Rio Gila, Ariz., in 1744.

Stucabitic.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 348, 1864. Stue Cabitic.—Sedelmair (1744) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889.

Stuckre. An unidentified Salishan band formerly at or about Port Madison Mills, w. Wash. Called "northern or Stuck-re Indians."—Maynard (1855) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 26, 34th Cong., 1st sess., 67, 1856.

Stucu. A Chumashan village formerly near Santa Inés mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Stugarok. A Nushagagmiut Eskimo village on Nushagak bay, Alaska, where there is a salmon cannery. Pop. 7 in 1890.—11th Census, Alaska, 95, 1893.

Stuichamukh. An Athapascan tribe, now absorbed into the surrounding Salishan tribes, that inhabited upper Nicola valley, Brit. Col. They have been supposed to be descendants of a war party of Tsilkotin (McKay in Dawson, Notes on Shuswap of Brit. Col., Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., ix, sec. 2, 23, 1891), but the evidence of their long occupancy of Nicola and Similkameen valleys has led Boas (10th Rep. N. W. Tribes, Rep. Brit. A. A. S., sec. 2, 33, 1895) to consider them the northernmost of the isolated Athapascan bands found along the Pacific coast. Four or five generations back they lived in three subterranean lodges, indicating a population of between 120 and 150.

Sti'leqamuq.—Boas in 10th Rep. N. W. Tribes, 32, 1905, ('people of the high country': Ntlakyapamuk name). Smilē'kamuq.—Ibid. (another Ntlakyapamuk name). Stāwi'hamuq.—Ibid.

Stuik (Stū'ix). A Bellacoola village on Bellacoola r., Brit. Col., 28 m. from its mouth.

Stū'ih.—Boas in 7th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 8, 1891. Stū'ix.—Boas in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 49, 1898.

Stuikishkeni (Stuikishxē'ni, 'where the canoes are drawn on shore'). A Modoc settlement on the n. side of Little Klamath lake, Oreg.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. I, xxxii, 1890.

Stukamasoosatick. A former Pima village on the Gila r. res., s. Ariz.—Dudley in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1871, 58, 1872.

Stulnaas-hadai (Stal na'as xā'da-i, 'steep-house people'). A subdivision of the Chaahl-lanas, a Haida family settled in Alaska; named from one of its houses.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Stumiks (Stū'miks, 'bulls'). A society of the Ikunuhkatsi, or All Comrades, in the Piegan tribe; it has been obsolete since about 1840.—Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 221, 1892.

Stung Serpent. See Olabalkebiche.

Stunhlai (Stā'nda-i, said to refer to "any fat game or fish brought in"). A Haida town on the n. w. coast of Moresby id., Brit. Col., occupied anciently by the Kas-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905.

Stuntusunwhott. A former Tolowa village on Smith r., Cal.

Stūn-tūs-un-whott.—Hamilton, Hay-narg-ger MS. vocab., B. A. E.

Stustas (Stā'stas). One of the most important Haida families of the Eagle clan. The name is that given to salmon eggs after the young fish have begun to take form in them. There is a story that this family was once reduced to a single woman, but subsequently increased very rapidly from her children; for that reason they were likened to spawning salmon. The family is known also as Sā'ngal-lā'nas, referring to sea-birds called sañg; when these birds find any food on the surface of the sea, all swoop down upon it, making a great noise, and their actions are likened to those of people at potlatches made by this family. According to tradition, part of the Stustas, including that to which the chief himself belonged, came down from Stikine r. in the Tlingit country, while the rest were from the country of the Nass people. Edenshaw (q. v.), the name of the chief, was also brought along from the Stikine. A chief of this family was very friendly to the whites, and it was largely through his influence that a mission was established at Masset. The Stustas land lay principally around Naikun and in Naden harbor, but their chief town was Kiusta, on the coast opposite North id. There were many subdivisions: Kawas, Kanguatlanas, Hlielung-keawai, Hlielung-stustae, Naikun-stustae, Chawagis-stustae, and the Yadus of Alaska, the last being still further subdivided. (J. R. S.)

Suahpi. One of the Diegueño rancherias represented in the treaty of 1852 at Santa Isabel, s. Cal.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 132, 1857.

Suahuaches. A former tribe encountered by Salinas in 1693 on the road from Coahuila to San Francisco mission, Texas.—Salinas (1693) in Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, MS.

Suamca. A Jesuit mission, founded by Father Kino among the Sobaipuri about 1687 (the Rudo Ensayo says in 1730); situated on the headwaters of Rio Santa Cruz, in the vicinity of Terrenate, Sonora, Mexico, just below the Arizona-Sonora boundary. In 1697 Bernal reported it to be in a prosperous condition; in 1731 it had several rancherias. Villa-Señor mentions it as a mission in 1748, and it was still in existence in 1767, at which date the population was 114. Quiburi, Optuabo, Esqugbaag, Baibcat, Turisai, and Babisi were its visitas. (F. W. H.)

Santa María de Suamca.—Roche (1768) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., II, 391, 1856. Santa María de Suanca.—Croix (1769), ibid., 10. Santa María Magdalena Soanca.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 347, 1864. Santa María Soamca.—Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1762), 148, 160, 1863. Santa María Soamnca.—Keler (1752) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., I, 276, 1856. Suamca.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., II, 177, 191, 1759.

Suanas. A former tribe, probably Coahuiltecan, met by Salinas on the road from Coahuila to San Francisco mission, Texas, in 1693.—Salinas (1693) in Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, MS.

Suangna. A former Gabrielleño rancheria in Los Angeles co., Cal., on the coast near Palos Verdes or Cerritos, at a locality later called Suanga.

Shua-vit.—Kroeber in Univ. Cal. Pub., Am. Archeol. and Ethnol., VIII, 39, 1908 (native form.) Suagna.—Reid (1852) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860. Suang-na.—Reid quoted by Hoffman in Bull. Essex Inst., XVII, 2, 1885.

Suaqui. One of the principal pueblos of the Nevome and seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1619. Situated near the lower Yaqui r., 20 m. w. of Onava, Sonora, Mexico. Pop. 415 in 1678, 42 in 1730. Its inhabitants were called Sibubapas.

S. Ignacio Subaque.—Zapata (1678) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., III, 358, 1857. Suaqui.—Rivera (1730) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 513, 1884. Zuake.—Kul, map (1702), in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 74, 1726. Zuaqui.—Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1762), 125, 1863.

Subazama. A former village, probably Salinan, connected with San Antonio mission, Monterey co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 27, 1860.

Subchiam. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Succaah. A band, probably Moquelumnan, formerly living in San Joaquin valley, or to the northward, in California.

Lukahs.—Johnston in Sen. Ex. Doc. 61, 32d Cong., 1st sess., 20, 1852. Suc-ca-ah.—Ryer, ibid., 21. Suc-co-ah.—Ryer in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 199, 1853.

Succatash. See Succotash.

Suconesset. A village of Praying Indians in 1685, near Falmouth, Barnstable co., Mass. The inhabitants were probably subject to either the Wampanoag or the Nauset.

Suconesset.—Writer about 1767 in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., III, 14, 1846. Sokones.—Bourne (1764), ibid., 1st s., I, 198, 1806. Sokonesset.—Freeman (1792), ibid., 231. Suconesset.—Freeman (1802), ibid., VIII, 152, 1802. Suconet.—Mourt (1622), ibid., 262. Suconussat.—Ibid., I, 198, note, 1806. Sukanessett.—Hinckley (1685), ibid., 4th s., V, 133, 1861.

Succotash. A corruption of a Narraganset name for an ear of corn, long misapplied by English-speaking people to a preparation of green corn cut from the cob, and transversely cut string-beans or shelled lima-beans boiled with the addition of milk, butter, and seasoning.

Roger Williams (1643) gives msickquatash (m'sikwatash) as the name for a boiled ear of corn, although the word signifies simply an ear of corn whether boiled or raw. Just when the name in a slightly more corrupt form was misapplied is not certain, since a gap occurs in the history of the word between 1643 and 1778, when it appears, in the form of "succatash," in Carver's Travels, a widely-read book in the time of its author. Carver describes "succatash" as a dish composed of corn, beans, and bear's flesh. The word is next mentioned by Jeremy Belknap (1792) in the form "succotash."

The Narraganset word m'sikwatash means 'the grains are whole (or entire),' i. e. not cracked or broken by pounding. The Caniba (Norridgewock) name mesikutar has the same meaning ("blé qui n'est pas pilé."—Râle). The old Abnaki inanimate plural was r instead of sh. The aboriginal name for the preparation that we call succotash has been lost. The form of the name would have been determined by the preponderance of corn or of beans in the stew, as may have been the case, since no Algonquian word can be formed to indicate that more than one vegetable is contained in a stew or soup. (W. R. G.)

Suchigin. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Suchni.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 453, 1874. Suchui.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Sudac. A Maricopa rancheria on the Rio Gila, Ariz., in 1744.—Sedelmair (1744) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889.

Sudacasasaba. A Maricopa settlement on the Gila r., Ariz., in the 18th century.

Sudacasasaba.—Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1762), 22, 1863.

Sudacasasaba.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 348, 1864.

Sudacson. A former Pima settlement on the Rio Gila, Pinal co., Ariz., between Casa Grande and a point 10 leagues below. It was visited by Kino in 1698, possibly as early as 1694, and named by him Encarnación. It was not far from the present Sacaton. According to Font the population was 5,000(?) in 1775. See Bartlett, below.

Encarnacion.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 259, note, 1884. Encarnacion Sutaquison.—Anza and Font (1780) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 392, 1889. La Encarnacion.—Venegas, Hist. Coll., V, 86, 1885 ('rabbits': so called by other Chippewa on account of their unwarlike disposition).

Suhinimiut ('people of the sun,' that is, living in the east). A tribe of Labrador Eskimo extending from Koksoak r. E. to C. Chidley and thence S. to Hamilton inlet. A part have long been Christianized by Moravian missionaries, but those of the northern districts still retain their heathen customs. Girls are tattooed at the age of puberty, though less elaborately than formerly; they are then forced into marriage, and early show the effects of their harsh and laborious life. Children are few and weak. Many men have two wives, the wealthy several. The aged and the diseased are frequently deserted, sometimes quietly strangled. An unlucky woman is driven out into the wilderness. A bad man is not admitted into the houses, and if he commits murder the others stone him to death. Blood vengeance is incumbent on the next of kin. The people are of the stature of Europeans and very muscular. Their legs are disproportionately short and malformed, owing probably to the habit of carrying infants in the hood. There is a recognized elder in the community, yet he is controlled by the angekok. These conjurers, who pretend to propitiate the malevolent spirits of nature and each man's evil spirit, work much harm, often separating man and wife on the plea that their union causes ill luck. The people often devour deer meat raw, though they prefer cooked food. The complexion of these Eskimo shows much variation; those who are bleached almost white in winter become quickly browned by exposure to the summer sun.

Subtribes are the Koksoagmiut, Kangivamiut, and Kilinigmiut. The mission stations are Hebron, Hopedale, Nachvak, Nain, Okak, Ramah, and Zoar. A native village on the N. coast is Aukpatuk.

Sāhinimiyut.—Turner in 11th Rep. B. A. E., 176, 1894. Sukhinimiyut.—Turner in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., V, 104, 1888.

Sukinatchi (Shukha-in-hacha, 'hog its river'). Given by Gatschet (Creek Migr. Leg., I, 109, 1884) as a former Choctaw settlement in Lowndes and Kemper cos., Miss. The mention of Lowndes co. must be a mistake, the name probably referring to those Choctaw living along Sukinatchie or Sookanatchie cr., in Kemper co. Halbert does not use this as the name of a town, and evidently it is a general term. Factory Indians.—Gatschet, op. cit. Senachas.—N. Y. Doc. Col. Sukkwan (said to be from Tlingit suq-qō-ān, 'grassy town'). A Haida town of the Koetas family, formerly on Cordova bay, in the Kaigani country, Alaska. In 1836–41 John Work stated the number of houses here was 14 and the number of people 229. Former inhabitants of this town can now recall 7 houses. Petroff in 1880–81 gave the number of people as 141. The town is now abandoned.

Suma. A semi-nomadic tribe, one branch of which formerly occupied the region of the Casas Grandes in Chihuahua, Mexico, and the other the vicinity of El Paso, Tex. The latter are mentioned in 1659, under the name Zumanas, as forming part of the mission population of San Lorenzo (q. v.), but the name Suma is used by Benavides as early as 1630. Vetancurt (ca. 1696) speaks also of the Zumas and Zumanas as living somewhat below El Paso, and Bandelier apparently classifies the former at least as the Suma. The names Zumanas and Jumanas seem to have been confused. At the instigation of the Pueblo Indians taken from the N. to El Paso by Gov. Otermín when retreating from Santa Fé, N. Mex., during the Pueblo revolt of 1680, this branch of the Suma became hostile to the whites and induced the friendly Manos to join them, with their confederates the Jano, in their outbreak of 1684. The Spaniards succeeded in reducing them two years later, forming them into several settlements about El Paso, but San Lorenzo was the only one that endured. In 1744 the tribe comprised 50 families; in 1765 only 21 families remained, the decrease in population being doubtless due to smallpox. Only one of the tribe was known to be living (at Senecú, Mexico) in 1897.

The mission of Casas Grandes was established among the southern branch of the tribe about 1664. At this time and for many years later they confederated with the Apache and Jocome in their depredations against the Piman tribes to their westward, particularly the Opata. The extermination of the Suma was probably due to Apache hostility. According to Orozco y Berra (p. 327) they spoke the Piro dialect, but there seems to be no warrant for this classification, and their linguistic affinities are not known. See Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 88-91, 1890. (F. W. H.)

Sunahaque. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Sun dance. The Sun dance was a ceremony confined to the Plains tribes. It was performed by the Arapaho, Cheyenne, Sikaika, and Cree of Algonquian stock; the Dakota, Aminiboin, Mandan, Crow, Ponca, and Omaha of Siouan stock; the Pawnee of Caddoan stock; the Kiowa; and the Shoshoni and Ute of Shoshonean stock. In its ceremonial forms the Sun dance of all these tribes seems related, and it may be regarded as a summer solstice ceremony, though in many tribes this element is largely or entirely obscured. The fundamental object of the ceremony seems to have been the overcoming of certain cosmic elements.

In all of the tribes the ritual is subordinated to the drama; the former never predominates, as it does in the star cult of the Pawnee ceremonies. The ritual, when present, is chanted, and consists of groups of songs, generally eight in number. As a rule these songs are sung on the night of the entrance into the lodge of the Sun dance.

The time of the ceremony is summer, varying from early to late in the season, and it may even be held in the autumn. Among some tribes, as the Siouan, the ceremony is annual, and is in charge of a self-perpetuating priesthood, apparently under the control of the war chief. In other tribes, especially those of Algonquian stock, the performance of the ceremony is dependent on a vow or a pledge made by an individual who hopes by such performance to ward off sickness from himself or from some member of his family, although other reasons for making the vow exist, the most common of these being to avert lightning.

The participants in the ceremony among the Siouan tribes, besides the priesthood, are selected and compelled to perform by the priests. In other tribes, as for example the Arapaho, the participants, other than the priests (who are those that have vowed the ceremony in former years), are those who have made minor vows, and whose participation is hence voluntary. Among such tribes the chief priest is chosen by the friends of the votary of the ceremony.

The duration of the ceremony varies among the different tribes, 8 days being the most common period. The period is largely dependent, however, on the number of fasting and dancing days, the preliminary days being 3 or 4 in number, and the dancing days from 1 to 4, though formerly, it would seem, 4 was the common number.

Among all tribes there is a division of the ceremony into secret rites and a public performance. The secret rites, occupying from 1 day to 4 days, are held in a tipi of preparation, which occupies a position alone in the camp circle. In at least one tribe there are four such tipis of preparation, each in charge of a leader. By the time of the erection of the secret tipi or tipis the camp circle has been formed in the shape of a horseshoe with the opening to the E.; here is camped the entire tribe, the arrangement of the family tipis being according to a fixed system. Within the secret tipi the priests congregate each day and spend their time in the performance of certain rites, consisting of smoking, feasting, praying, and the preparation of objects that are to be used upon the altar or worn during the public performance. On the last day of the secret rites a great lodge is built in the center of the camp circle, the selection of the site being the office of a special individual and attended with rites. The gathering of suitable timber for the lodge and its erection are usually done by one or more warrior organizations. The selection of the center pole is accompanied with special rites and usually is in charge of the most noted warrior or warriors of the tribe. The lodge varies from a roofless inclosure with a tall center pole, as among the Siouan tribes, to a partially covered structure, consisting of an outer row of forked uprights connected by cross-bars, from which rafter poles extend to the fork of the center pole. The lodge is from 60 to 100 ft. in diameter, and is always provided with an opening toward the E. On the completion of the lodge, generally late in the afternoon, the priests formally abandon the secret tipi of preparation, and reside until the termination of the ceremony in the Sun-dance lodge proper. On this night the lodge is formally dedicated, often with elaborate rites; the warrior societies parade, and the chiefs signalize the bravery of certain young men of the tribe by specially designating them by name. On the morning following the erection of the lodge the altar is set up near its western side. The altar varies from the simple buffalo skull and pipe on a cleared circle of earth, as among the Ponca, to an elaborate arrangement of a buffalo skull, an excavation with a dry sand-painting, upright sticks with rainbow symbols, and various bushes and young trees, as among the Cheyenne. On the completion of the altar the priests decorate the bodies, naked except for a loin cloth, of those who are to dance; these, together with the priests, have taken neither food nor drink since the preceding night. After the dancers have been painted, and decked with sage or willow wreaths about the head, neck, waist, wrists, and ankles, the dancers, forming in line, dance toward the center pole, representing the sun, blowing whistles made of the wing-bones of eagles to accompany Sundance songs, which are sung by musicians seated about a large drum at the southern side of the entrance. After an interval, which may be a day, the paint is removed and renewed, and the ceremony is resumed, and to the end the dancers thus alternately dance and rest. At the close of the performance the dancers in some tribes take an emetic, drink medicine-water, break their fast, and then enter the sweat-lodge. In all tribes, so far as known, the lodge with its accompanying altar is abandoned to the elements, for it is considered sacred and may not be disturbed. Among several taboos of the ceremony, one most frequent and almost universal is that forbidding the presence of menstruating women.

mance is that of voluntary self-laceration or torture. The two most common forms of torture were (1) to attach the free end of a reata that had been fastened to the center fork of the lodge, to a skewer inserted in the loose skin of the breast, and (2) to drag around inside the camp circle one or more buffalo-skulls by a reata the other end of which was attached to a skewer inserted in the back. In some tribes a small piece of flesh was cut from the arm or shoulder of the dancer and was offered with tobacco seeds at the foot of the center pole. The amount of torture performed seems to have been greatest among the Cheyenne and Mandan. Torture in any form was not tolerated by the Kiowa; indeed, the appearance of blood at any stage of the ceremony was regarded by them as an ill omen, and it is said sometimes to have caused the ceremony to cease.

A form of sacrifice other than torture, consisting in the offering of the cast-off clothing of children or adults to the lodge on the last day, was practised by several tribes, especially those of Algonquian stock.

The ceremony of the Sun dance abounds in symbolism, no rite being performed except in a prescribed manner. There seems to have been universal veneration of the four cardinal points. The sun, or a god spoken of as the "great mystery," "great medicine," or "man above," was even more prominent, being symbolized by the center pole. The salient features of the symbolism may be epitomized as follows: The tipi of secret preparation corresponds to the sacred mountain to which the originator of the ceremony repaired when in distress and there learned the mysteries of the ceremony. The rites of the secret tipi represent the acts performed originally in the sacred mountain, and hence are a kind of rehearsal. The secret tipi is often spoken of as the "rabbit" or "lone" tipi or the "morning star." The camp circle symbolizes the constellation Corona Borealis, which is frequently spoken of by the Plains tribes as the camp circle of the gods above. Again, the camp circle may be regarded as symbolizing the horizon, standing for the universe. The lodge itself represents this earth, as the home of man. The altar symbolizes the essence of life or spring of fertilization. In the fork of the center pole was the nest of the thunderbird. Into the nest a digging stick was usually thrust, symbolic of that used by the woman who in the well-known tale climbed to the sky in pursuit of a porcupine and later gave birth to the Sun Boy. While the center pole itself, with its bands of red and black paint, is symbolic of earth and heaven, and typifies the supreme medicine or mystery, it may be regarded as symbolizing also, especially at the time of its capture, the common enemy of the tribe. The Cheyenne declare, indeed, that from the fork of the center pole was formerly suspended alive an enemy captured in war. The dancers collectively overcome an enemy, generally the sun, and by their medicine compel the thunderbird to release rain. The wreaths worn by dancers are symbols of the sun, and the four old men in the dance represent the gods of the four world-quarters, while the paints applied to the body, usually four in number, are progressive in their virtue, generally culminating in a black paint, which may be regarded as defying the rain to wash it off. The painted designs are symbols of the sun, the moon, the morning star, and the gods of the four world-quarters. The whistling symbolizes the breath, or life, of man, and at the same time the cry of the thunderbird. Vomiting and sweating are employed as purification rites. The fasting and the self-inflicted torture are penance, done to obtain special favor of the gods, and represent the fast of the originator of the ceremony.

In the ritual of the Sun dance it is related that once in a period of famine an individual wandered forth with a female companion in behalf of his tribe, encountered a deity, fasted, learned the ceremony, returned to the tribe, caused the ceremony to be performed, and thus brought relief from famine through the appearance of the buffalo. The ceremony accordingly may be regarded as one of rebirth or re-animation. In the tribes which have this ritual the one who has made the vow at a stated period of the ceremony offers his wife to the chief priest, thus exemplifying the act of the originator of the ceremony, who offered his companion to the one from whom he obtained the ceremony.

The Sun dance, being strongly opposed by the missionaries because it was utterly misunderstood, and finding no favor in official circles, has been for many years an object of persecution, and in consequence is extinct among the Dakota, the Crows, and the Mandan, of the Siouan stock, and among the Pawnee and the Kiowa. It is still performed by the Cree, Siksika, Arapaho, Cheyenne, Assiniboin, Ponca, Shoshoni, and Ute. Its disappearance among certain of these tribes, such as the Ponca, is near at hand, for it has lost part of its rites and has come to be largely a spectacle for gain rather than a great religious ceremony.

The Sun dance was not only the greatest ceremony of the Plains tribes, but was a condition of their existence. More than any other ceremony or occasion, it furnished the tribe the opportunity for the expression of emotion in rhythm, and was the occasion of the tribe becoming more closely united. It gave opportunity for the making and renewing of common interests, the inauguration of tribal policies, and the renewing of the rank of the chiefs; for the exhibition, by means of mourning feasts, of grief over the loss of members of families; for the fulfilment of social obligations by means of feasts; and, finally, for the exercise and gratification of the emotions of love on the part of the young in the various social dances which always formed an interesting feature of the ceremony. With the disappearance of tribal organization and tribal interests, there is no doubt of the ultimate doom of the Sun dance. See Ceremony, Dance, Mythology, Religion. (G. A. D.)

Sûski-kwe.—Cushing in 13th Rep. B. A. E., 368, 1896 (kwe = 'people')

Sus-kso'-yika.—Hayden, Ethnog. and Philol. Mo. Val., 264, 1862.

Susolas. A tribe seen by Cabeza de Vaca (Smith's trans., 72, 84, 1851) during his sojourn in Texas in 1527-34, that lived opposite the Atayos (Toho?), with whom they were at war. During the season of gathering prickly-pears they were associated with other tribes of the vicinity which spoke different tongues. So far as known the tribe is extinct.

Lusolas.—Cabeça de Vaca, op. cit., 72. Susolas.—Ibid., 121. Susoles.—Davis, Span. Conq. N. Mex., 82, 1869.

Susquehanna. A town and a tribe of the Iroquoian stock, situated in 1608 on the lower portion of the Susquehanna r. and its affluents. The original form of the name used by Capt. John Smith was Sasquesahannocks in his text and Sasquesahanough on his map. He first heard the name from Tockwock, Nanticoke, or Powhatan speakers of the Algonquian tongue, while exploring the waters of upper Chesapeake bay and its affluents, as the designation of a mighty people who dwelt on the Susquehanna two days journey "higher than our barge could pass for rocks." Of this people Smith wrote: "Such great and well-proportioned men are seldom seen, for they seemed like giants to the English, yea to their neighbors;" also that they were scarcely known to Powhatan, could muster nearly 600 able men, and lived in palisaded towns to defend themselves from the "Massawomeckes, their mortal enemies." Meeting at the head of the bay 60 of their warriors, five of their chiefs did not hesitate to board his barge. Although in his text Smith does not mention the names of any Susquehanna towns, he nevertheless places on his map 6 towns with "king's houses" under the general rubric "Sasquesahanough." The six are Sasquesahanough, Quadroque, Attaock, Tesinigh, Utchowig, and Cepowig. It is difficult to locate these towns correctly on a modern map; the foregoing names are evidently highly conventionalized forms of the original native terms. Unfortunately Smith furnishes but little information regarding these people beyond a description of their bearing, size, and implements, and a general statement as to their habitat and their enemies, the most formidable of the latter being the famous "Massawomeckes."

Alsop (1666) says that the Christian inhabitants of Maryland regarded the Susquehanocks as "the most noble and heroic nation of Indians that dwell upon the confines of America," and that the other Indians "by a submissive and tributary acknowledgment" held them in like esteem, for he adds that being for the most part great warriors, they "seldom sleep one summer in the quiet arms of a peaceful rest, but keep (by their present power, as well as by their former conquest) the several nations of Indians round about them, in a forceable obedience and subjection." He declares also that men, women, and children in both summer and winter went practically naked; that they painted their faces in red, green, white, and black stripes; that their skins were naturally light in color, but were changed to a dark cinnamon hue "by the several dyeings of roots and barks"; that the hair of the head was black, long, and coarse, but that the hair growing on other parts of the body was removed by pulling it out hair by hair; that some tattooed their bodies, breasts, and arms with outlines of beasts and other objects.

Hitherto no information concerning a clan system among the Susquehanna has been available in ethnologic literature; but in the Proceedings of the Council of Maryland for 1636-1667 (pp. 421, 550) the names of the "Sasquesahanough" chiefs and delegates, and also those of the several clans to which they belonged, appear in the minutes of a treaty concluded at Spes Utia, May 16, 1661, in behalf of the Lord Proprietary of Maryland and of the Susquehanna Indians, and at a conference held at St Johns, June 29, 1666. The names of the Susquehanna delegates to the former were: "Dahadaghesa of the great Torripine family, Sarangararo of the Wolf family, Waskanecqua of the Ohongeoquena nation, Kagoregago of the Unquehiatt nation, Saraqundett of the Kaiquariegahaga nation, Uwhanhierelera of the Usququhaga nation, and Waddon hago of the Sconondihago nation; but among the signatures appears the name Andra Sonque without that of his clan or nation. It was at this treaty that the Maryland authorities agreed to send 50 soldiers to aid the Susquehanna against the Seneca (here called Cynaco, Nayssone, or Naijssone), in consequence of which Capt. Odber was ordered to cause some "spurs and flankes" to be laid out for the defense of the Susquehanna fort and inmates, "whom you are upon all occasions to assist against the assaults of their enemies." At the conference of June 29, 1666, at St Johns, Wastahanda Hariguera of the Terrapin or Turtle clan, and Gosweincrecrakqua of the Fox clan, war chiefs of the Susquehanna, brought Wanahedana to justice, "lest the crime of one be imputed to the whole tribe," and asked assistance from the governor "at this time," for they had lost a large number of men who were ranging about the head of Patapsco and other rivers to secure the English plantations from the Seneca, who, they declared, were resolved to storm the Susquehanna fort in the following August and then fall upon the English; and they also agreed to deliver the "King of Potomack his two sons" to Major Goldsmyth. At the former treaty it was stipulated also that 6 Susquehanna warriors should act as dispatch bearers.

On July 28, 1663, the Maryland authorities gave to Civility and the rest of the Susquehanna Indians 2 barrels of powder, 200 pounds of lead, and their own choice of one of two small cannon. At this conference Wastahandow of the Turtle clan declared that it was not "the Sasquesahanoughs" but the Seneca who began the war, for the Seneca had killed the Susquehanna ambassadors and had robbed them of 70 belts of wampum; and he declared that their enemies (such of the Iroquois tribes as were engaged in making war on them) mustered about 1,460 warriors, while the Susquehanna had about 700 fighting men.

In the writings of Swedish and Dutch authors many references are found to a people called therein Minquas, Minquosy, or Machoeretini (in De Laet), Mengwe, or Mingo, names which were evidently bestowed on them by the Algonquians of the lower Delaware r. and bay. It would seem that in the earliest application of the names Susquehanna and Minqua they denoted a tribe or group of allied tribes which from 1608 to 1633 waged relentless war against the Algonquian tribes on and about the lower portion of Potomac r. and Delaware r. and bay. De Vries says that on Feb. 11, 1633, when he and a small crew were in the Delaware r. opposite Ft Nassau, 50 Indians came over the river from the fort and spoke to him and his men. He states that these were Minquas dwelling among "the English of Virginia," and that, numbering 600 warriors, they had come on a warlike expedition, but that they were friendly with him and his men; that while in that immediate vicinity two days later, three Indians of the Armewamen came to him and reported that they were fugitives from the Minquas, who had killed some of their people, plundered them of their corn, and burned their houses, and that these Minquas had killed 90 men of the Sankiekens (Sankhikans); also that the Minquas had returned to their own country. But subsequent to this period these two names, Susquehanna and Minqua, especially the latter, had acquired a broader and more comprehensive signification. Van der Donck, writing prior to 1653, says, "With the Minquas we include the Senecas, the Maquas, and other inland tribes."

On July 24, 1608, Capt. John Smith began his exploration of Susquehanna r., completing the work on Sept. 8 of the same year. As already stated, in his text he calls the Indians he found inhabiting the river, Sasquesahannocks, but on his map he recorded the name Sasquesahanoughs, and the name of their town Sasquesahanough. The exact situation of this town is not definitely known, but a satisfactory approximation may be made. Smith said that it was "two days' journey higher than our barge could pass for rocks." The rocks are at Port Deposit, Md., and 40 or 50 m. above this point may be tentatively taken as the approximate situation of the town. Smith locates it on the e. side of the Susquehanna, a short distance above the confluence of a feeder from the w. side. It is matter of record that a "Sasquehanocksnew-town" existed about 1648 where "some falls below hinder navigation," and that in 1670 Augustine Herrman located Canooge, "the present Sassquahana Indian fort," on the w. bank just above the "greatest fall" (the present Conewago falls); and they also had a palisaded town at the mouth of the Octoraro, probably as early as 1662, so that the Susquehanna of 1608 may probably have been in the vicinity of the Conewago falls. In Smith's text a remarkable silence is maintained as to the names of any other towns of the Susquehanna, but on his map he places five other towns with king's houses: Attaock, Quadroque, Tesinigh, Utchowig, and Cepowig, and with the single exception of Cepowig, which is located on the e. side of the main stream of Willowby's r., all these towns are located on the Susquehanna or on some of its affluents. Since no Indians were found along the upper portion of the w. shore of the bay, there can be little doubt that Cepowig was a Susquehanna town, for an early writer in a general recapitulation of names and situations of tribes says that "the Sasquesahanoes are on the Bolus river." The "Bolos r." of Smith is the present Patapsco, which flows into Chesapeake bay at Baltimore. This would seem to indicate that Cepowig, located by Smith on Willowbye's r., which is apparently only a continuation of what is to-day Bush r. (unless it was placed there instead of on the Patapsco by an engraver's inadvertence), was at all events well within the "Sasquesahanough" country. Under the circumstances it is a question whether these five towns, which were not mentioned in the text of Smith, are to be regarded as Susquehanna towns rather than as the chief towns of allied or neighboring tribes. With the meager data supplied by their position on the Smith map, it is difficult to assign them a definite geographical position on a modern map. One of the interpretations of the indicative marks places Cepowig in the vicinity either of Westminster, Md., or of Gettysburg, Pa.; Quadroque about Middletown; Tesinigh about Lebanon; Attaock about York; and Utchowig in the region of Carlisle. The other broader and, perhaps, intended view would locate Attaock in the region of Juniata r., Quadroque at the forks at Northumberland, Tesinigh on the North branch in the region of Wyoming, and Utchowig on the West branch in the vicinity of Lockhaven. Marked with "king's houses," they may have indicated the seats of neighboring tribes, whether allied or hostile.

From the data found in Smith it is difficult to form a satisfactory estimate of the population of the Susquehanna at that early date. Smith said that the "Sasquesahannocks" could muster "near 600 able and mighty men," who were entrenched in palisaded towns "to defend them from the Massawomeckes, their mortal enemies." To these people, whom Smith designated by the name "Sasquesahanough," modernized to Susquehanna, the Dutch and Swedes on Delaware r. and bay applied the name Minqua, or Mincquaas, with its many variants, which the English adopted with a wider and varying application, under the form Mingo. De Vries, in Feb., 1633, while cruising in the vicinity of Ft Nassau on Delaware r., encountered a detachment of 50 Indians from a larger body consisting of 600 men. Crossing the river from the fort, they came alongside his yacht and spoke to him and his men in a friendly manner. He learned that they were Minquas who dwelt "among the English of Virginia," and who had come on a warlike expedition. The next day, while sailing up the river, he met three Arme-wamen Indians who declared to him that they were fugitives from the Minquas who had killed some of their people, as above mentioned. The trio had left the main body of their people with the women and children five or six hours journey distant, and had come there to learn in what way the Minqua had gone; they declared that 90 men of the Sankhikans (Sankiekens) had been killed by these Minqua and that the Minqua had returned to their country (Coll. N. Y. Hist. Soc., 2 s., III, pt. 1, 31-32, 1857). This indicates that the people called Minqua or Sasquesahanna in 25 years had not lost their military strength, although they were engaged in continual wars with the Algonquian tribes on Delaware r. and bay, and on the Potomac. Hence it would appear that Smith's statement that they could muster in 1608 nearly 600 men did not include those belonging to the five towns exclusive of Sasquesahanough. They were in 1608 waging war on the Massawomeckes.

On Aug. 18, 1616, Captain Hendricksen reported to the New Netherland Provinces his discovery of certain lands, a bay and three rivers, lying from 38° to 40° N. lat.; that there he traded for "sables, furs, robes, and other skins," and that he also traded for and bought from the inhabitants, the Minquaes, "three persons, being people belonging to this company, which three persons were employed in the service of the Mohawks and Machicans, giving for them kettles, beads, and merchandise" (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., 1, 14, 1854). This is perhaps the first notice of the name Minqua on record, if its use on the map accompanying this report be excepted. The map bears date 1614 (Oct. 11) and is the famous "Carte Figurative." It is the first known attempt to portray geographically the Susquehanna r. and valley with the tribes of Indians dwelling in the region covered; the map, in fact, includes the region now within New York and Pennsylvania, and represents the Susquehanna as an outlet of L. Ontario. A legend on the map says that the data concerning the location of rivers and the position of the tribes were obtained from Kleynties and his comrade, which they had acquired in an expedition from the Mohawk (Maquaas) into the interior and along the New r. (Susquehanna) downward to the Ogehage, who are identified as the "enemies of the aforesaid northern tribes"; and, further, that the positions of the tribes (Sennecas, Gachooos, Capitannasses, and Jottecas) should be indicated as considerably farther to the w. On the above-mentioned map the "Sennecas" are located some distance n. of a branch of the river which was evidently intended to represent Chemung r. of to-day; lower down, on what represented the West branch of the Susquehanna, on the s. side, the "Gachooos" are placed, with four designs denoting lodges (towns); on what probably represents the present Juniata r., on the n. side, some distance from the confluence with the Susquehanna, the Capitannasses are placed, with seven designs denoting towns arranged some distance apart along the course of the river; s. and slightly farther w. into the interior the "Iottecas" (Jottecas) are placed, with five designs representing towns set close together; and much farther down, on the w. side, a short distance below the confluence of a branch on the e. side, probably Conestoga cr., the "Mincquaas" are placed, with four palisaded towns, three of which are marked with two towns and one with four. The name "Mincquaas" occurs on the e. side of the Susquehanna a short distance above the branch last mentioned, but without any designs denotive of lodges or towns. The four palisaded towns were probably not far from the present Conewango r. and falls of the Susquehanna. This disposition of the tribes on the Susquehanna shows that the name "Mincquaas" was originally applied specifically to the people who dwelt in the same general position as those whom Smith called "Sasquesahanoughs." The Mohawk (Maquaas), with five closely set designs of lodges, are placed on the n. side of what purports to be an affluent of L. Ontario, in a relatively correct geographical position; on the opposite side of the river occurs the name "Canoomakers," which is apparently miswritten for Caughnawaga. This map exhibits a noteworthy knowledge of the interior of the region now comprised in New York and Pennsylvania, and of the names and position of the several Indian tribes inhabiting it. This name later came to include many tribes and remnants of tribes which dwelt of their own accord or were forced to dwell in the valley of Susquehanna r., but the period must be known before it is possible to state the names of the tribes inhabiting that stream. For during the middle decades of the 16th century all the tribes dwelling along this r. at the time of its discovery were destroyed as political entities and removed by the Iroquois.

In 1647, learning that the Hurons were being worsted by the Iroquois, the Susquehanna or Conestoga offered them diplomatic and military assistance, backed by a force of 1,300 warriors in a single palisaded town, who had been trained by three Swedish soldiers in the use of guns and in European tactics (Bozman, Hist. Md., II, 273, 1837; Proud, Hist. Pa., I, 111, 1897). This proffered aid was accepted by the hard-pressed Hurons, who sent at once an embassy to the Susquehanna or Conestoga capital. The Susquehanna lost no time in sending ambassadors, with suitable wampum belts and presents, to the Iroquois federal council at Onondaga, for the purpose of ending the war and establishing peace between the Hurons and the Iroquois; but the Iroquois refused the mediation and the war continued. On the other hand, the Hurons, sunk in a hopeless lethargy, did not actively seek to avail themselves of the Susquehanna aid, and so in less than 18 months they were entirely defeated and dispersed by the Iroquois.

From about 1630 to 1644 the Susquehanna waged a relentless war southward from their homes against the Yaomacos, the Piscataway, and the Patuxent (Bozman, op. cit., II, 161, 1837), and they created so much trouble for the colonists that Gov. Calvert, in 1642, by proclamation, declared them public enemies. Holm (Descr. New Sweden, Mem. Hist. Soc. Pa., III, 157, 1834), says that the Minques or Minckus live on a "high mountain, very steep and difficult to climb; there they have a fort or square building, surrounded with palisades, in which they reside. . . . There they have guns, and small cannon, with which they shoot and defend themselves, and take them when they go to war." He says that this place was situated 12 Swedish or 54 English m. from the Swedish settlements, and that they had forced the surrounding tribes to be subject and tributary to them, "so that they dare not stir, much less go to war against them."

In 1652, having maintained for a number of years friendly intercourse with their European neighbors, the Susquehanna, in the presence of a Swedish commissioner, through their chiefs, Sawageh, Auroghteregh, Scarhuhadigh, Rutchogah, and Nathheldaneh, ceded to Maryland all their territory from the Patuxent r. to Palmer's id., and from Choptank r. to the n. e. branch, n. of Elk r.

Early in Apr. 1663, the Onondaga, Cayuga, and Seneca, in pressing more vigorously the war which had been waging for a number of years, dispatched an expedition of 800 men against Susquehanna itself (properly called Andastoé, by the Jesuit Relations). The narrative is indefinite as to the situation of the objective point of the expedition. Erroneously adopting the geography of the "Carte Figurative," it states that this Iroquois army embarked on L. Ontario, and near one of its extremities came to a large river leading without rapids or falls to the very gates of Susquehanna (Andastogue). On arriving there, after a voyage of more than 100 leagues on the river, they found the town defended on one side by the stream and on the others by trunks of large trees; it was flanked by two bastions constructed in accordance with European methods, and was also furnished with some pieces of artillery.

The Iroquois consequently abandoned the idea of making an assault. In attempting to outwit the Susquehanna by a transparent ruse, 25 of their men were admitted into the fort; but these were at once seized, placed on scaffolds in sight of their own army, and burned to death. The humiliated Iroquois force retired to act on the defensive. At home the Iroquois tribes were at this time menaced by three scourges—their Susquehanna (Conestoga) enemies, the smallpox (which was carrying off not only women and children but many men, thus leaving, it is said, their villages nearly deserted and their lands untilled), and, consequently, by famine. The situation of the Susquehanna fort at this date was probably above the falls at Conewango, and may have been the Canoe of Herrman's map of 1673.

Brebeuf (Jes. Rel. 1635, 33, 1858) rejoices that the Huron or Wendat tongue, which he thoroughly understood, was spoken by about 12 populous sedentary tribes dwelling s. of the French settlements. Of these the following are of interest in the present connection: The Andastoerrhonons, the Scahentoarrhonons, the Rhierrhonons, and the Ahouenrochrhonons. From the long and important list of tribes found in the Jesuit Relation for 1640 (35, 1858), which is apparently a slightly enlarged enumeration of the one just cited, it is found that the name Akhrakvaeronon appears in place of Scahentoarrhonons. These four tribes have been identified as the Conestoga, the people of the Great Flats or Wyoming, the Erie, and the Wenroh, the last a tribe which migrated to and became incorporated with the Hurons in 1639. The Scahentoarrhonons were probably the Massawomeckes of Smith. The name itself is derived from other forms, among which are Andasto'eronon and Gandasto'eronon, which appear in Mohawk as Ganastohgeronon. Du Creux, in his Latin map of 1660, translates this name by "Natio perticarum," meaning simply "Pole or (roof-) pole tribe." This is not satisfactory, as no account is taken of the incorporated verb -o', 'to be immersed,' 'to be contained in'; and there is a question as to the identification of the nominal element as kanasta', 'roof-pole,' for ka'nestā', 'mud,' 'ciay,' is equally possible. Conestoga or Conestogues is the Anglicized form of the French spellings.

In 1615 Champlain sent his interpreter Brulé to one of the allied tribes of the Hurons, which lived on the Susquehanna three days journey from the Seneca (meaning the four western Iroquois tribes). From the Bear nation of the Hurons, Champlain learned that this allied tribe was very warlike and possessed only three among more than twenty towns which were hostile to them; that the year before they had captured three Dutchmen who were assisting their enemies and whom they permitted to go without harm, for they thought the Dutchmen were French, the allies of the Hurons. Brulé did not report to Champlain until 1618, and from him the latter learned that the chief town of the tribe visited by Brulé, called Carantouan, was defended by 800 warriors, was only 7 days journey from where the Dutch traded, in lat. 40°, and that along the river below it were "many powerful and warlike nations, carrying on wars against each other." On the Champlain map of 1632 this tribe is called "Carantouanais." A noteworthy correspondence is found in the number of towns assigned to this tribe by Champlain and the number assigned to the Massawomeckes by Smith. Champlain said that the tribe had three towns, although he named only one after Brulé reported to him; and Smith on his map under the legend "Massawomecks" places three kings' houses, which are evidently intended for towns, as he names one Massawomeck. Concerning the Massawomeckes, Smith learned that "beyond the mountains from whence is the head of the river Patawomeke, the savages report, inhabit their most mortal enemies, the Massawomekes, upon a great salt water," and that this people were a great nation and very populous; and that "the heads of all those rivers, especially the Pattawomekes, the Pautuxuntes, the Sasquesahanocks, the Tockwoughes, are continually tormented by them. While exploring Chesapeake bay he met 7 canoes full of these Indians; and judging by their "targets, baskets, swords, tobacco pipes, platters, bows and arrows," and other things, he decided that "they much exceeded them of our parts." Noting their dexterity in the management of their canoes, "made of the barks of trees, sewed together with bark, and well luted with gum," he concluded that they were seated on some great water. He says that they were "much extolled" by the Nanticoke and their neighbors. He also learned that they had "so many men that they made war with all the world," and that the Massawomeckes were "higher up in the mountains." These references to the presence of mountains in the country of the Massawomeckes well describe the mountainous regions of upper Susquehanna r. and its branches. As Scahentowanen in "Scahentowanen-rhonon" signifies 'It is a very great plain,' and was the Huron and Iroquois name of the Wyoming plain or flats in Pennsylvania, it seems probable that Heckewelder's suggested derivation of the name Wyoming from a Delaware or cognate term is merely a translation of the Iroquoian term. Heckewelder says, M'cheuómi or M'cheuwámi "signifieth extensive level flats," and because of the large falls on this river, it is called, he says, "M'chweuwami Sipu" by the Delawares, and "Quahonta" by the Six Nations, which is the nominal stem in the Iroquoian term in question. The locative of the Delaware term would be M'cheuóming, or M'cheuwáming, meaning 'at the great flats, or plain,' which the English have changed into "Wyoming." The animate plural added to the first of these examples would produce M'cheuómek, which Smith heard from another dialect as "Massawomecke." This seems to confirm the suggestion that the "Massawomecks" of Smith were identical with the "Scahentoarrhonons" of the Jesuit Relation for 1635. It has been seen that Akhrakvaeronon, of which Atra'kwae'ronnons is a well-known dialectic variation in Huron (in which kh=t), is a synonym of Scahentoarrhonons, and so it is possible to show that these people of Wyoming were destroyed by the Iroquois in 1652. Two entries in the Journal des PP. Jésuites for 1652 explain this; the entry for June 5 says that "the Iroquois, having gone during the winter in full force against the Atra'kwae'ronnons or Andasto'e'ronnons, had had the worst of it," but that for July 3 says the news was "the capture of Atra'kwa'e [= Atra'kwaye] by the Iroquois Nations, to the number of a thousand. They have carried off 5 or 6 hundred—chiefly men. The Mohawk lost in this expedition 10 men; the other cantons, some 20, some 30—all together, 130." The identification of Atra'kwa'e with Andasto'e' in the foregoing citations is probably due to a misconception of the relator. From the Journal des PP. Jésuites for 1651 (Apr. 22) it is learned that in the autumn of 1650, 1,500 Iroquois had attacked the Neutrals and had taken one of their towns, but that the Neutrals, led by the Tohontaenrat, the Deer tribe of the Hurons, named the White-eared, fell on the retreating Iroquois and killed or captured 200; that, notwithstanding this reverse, 1,200 Iroquois returned thither during the winter of 1651 to avenge their loss. The Journal for Apr. 7, 1652 says only 600 Iroquois struck this blow. In the same Journal for 1652 (Apr. 19) it is stated that the Neutrals have formed an alliance with those of Andasto'e' (= Kanasto'ge) against the Iroquois; that the Seneca, going to war against the Neutrals, had been defeated, and as a consequence the women had been compelled to leave Sonnontouan (the Seneca capital) and withdraw to the Cayuga; and that during the winter the Mohawk had gone to war toward Andasto'e', the result being unknown. The Jesuit Relation for 1651 (chap. II, ed. 1858) gives the information that the Iroquois for a year past had turned their arms against the Neutrals and had met with some success, taking two frontier towns, in one of which were 1,600 men. One was taken in the autumn of 1650, and the other in the early spring of 1651; the destruction of life was great, especially among the aged and the children, and the number of captives, particularly young women, was very large. This loss brought about the total dispersal of the Neutrals, but did not result by any means in the total extinction of the people of that nation, as the following citation from the Journal des PP. Jésuites for 1653 clearly indicates, when considered in connection with the reputed alliance of the Neutrals with the Conestoga, mentioned above, giving some insight into the state of affairs in regard to the Erie and allied tribes southward. "All the Algonquian Nations are assembling, with what remains of the Tobacco Nation and of the Neutral Nation, at Ayotonatendiye [i. e., At Potawatomi Place], 3 days' journey above the Sault Skiaue [i. e., Sault Ste Marie], toward the south. Those of the Tobacco Nation have wintered at Teyaonto'rayi [i. e., At Michilimackinac]; the Neutrals, to the number of 800, at Sken'chioye [i. e., At the Place of the Foxes, being s. of Detroit], toward Teyo'chanontian [Detroit]; these two nations are to betake themselves next autumn to the "Place of the Potawatomi, where even now they number a thousand men, to wit, 400 Potawatomi, 200 Ottawa or Cheveux Relevez, 100 Winnebago, people from the Nation of A'chawi, 200 Chippewa, and 200 Missisauga and allies. A'chawi is the one who is directing all this affair." (In the italicized native words the letter y has been substituted for the inverted comma of the original.) Of all the tribes which at this period became involved in war with the Iroquois, the Erie and allies apparently do not appear in this complot of the enemies of the Iroquois. But it is very probable that the Erie here appear under the name Achawi, or A'chawi, which was seemingly their Algonquian appellation. And it may be that this name is a form of Smith's Utchowig, the final g being the animate plural sign. It is evidently a translation of the Iroquois-Huron name Rhierrhonon and cognate forms (see Erie), which signify, apparently, 'People of the place of panthers,' or possibly of wildcats, the name being generic for both of these animals. For wildcat, Smith gives utchunquoyes, Strachey gives utchoonggwai for a cat or a wild beast much larger and spotted black under the belly like a lynx, and uttacawai for "lynx," which of course was probably intended for panther, and the native terms employed by him are evidently cognate. From the Jesuit Relation for 1647-48, in reference to the Rhiierrhonon, it is learned that the s. shores of L. Erie were formerly inhabited "by certain tribes whom we call the Nation of the Cat; they have been compelled to retire far inland to escape their enemies, who are farther west"; and further that they had a number of fixed towns, as they cultivated the soil. This would indicate that before this date the Erie had been forced eastward into the region along the w. branch of the Susquehanna or the upper waters of the Allegheny. Now, it was from this latter region that the Wenrohrhonon, an allied tribe of the Neutrals, emigrated in 1639 to the Huron country. Of these, Father Du Peron wrote, Apr. 27, 1639: "We have a foreign nation taking refuge here both on account of the Iroquois, their enemies, and of the epidemic, which is still causing them great mortality; nearly all of them are baptized before death." And Bressani (Relation for 1653, Thwaites' ed., 39, 141), writing of the Wenrohrhonon (Ahouenrochrhonons), said that they had then recently come into the Huron country and "had formerly traded with the English, Dutch, and other heretical Europeans." At this point it may be well to cite some information concerning a little-known people, called the Black Minquas, who apparently dwelt in the region now under consideration, that s. e. of L. Erie and the Juniata, and the w. branch of the Susquehanna. Some interesting data are obtained from an extended legend appearing on Herrman's map of Virginia and Maryland, prepared in 1670 and issued in 1673. Beyond the Alleghany mts. all the streams flow westward either into "the Bay of Mexico or the West Sea," especially the first one discovered, "a very great River, called the Black Mincquaas River" (i. e., the Ohio), whereon lived the tribe of that name. There was a branch (the Conemaugh) of the "Black Mincquaas River" opposite a branch (the Juniata) of the Susquehanna r., which entered the main stream of the Susquehanna some leagues above the "Sassquahana forte," placed by the map on the right bank near "the greatest fall, . . . where formerly those Black Mincquaas came over as far as Delaware to trade"; but that "the Sassquahana and Sinnicus Indians went over and destroyed that very great nation." Van der Donck mentions these Indians, assigning them a general position and stating: "The beavers are mostly taken far inland, there being few of them near the settlements—particularly by the Black Minquas, who are thus named because they wear a black badge on their breast, and not because they are really black." One other reference to these people is found in Beekman's Letter of Dec. 23, 1662 (Pa. Archives, 2d s., vii, 695, 1878), wherein the statement is made that 5 Minquas (Susquehanna) chiefs informed him that they expected shortly the assistance of 800 Black Minquas, of whom 200 had already arrived, so that they were fully resolved to carry the war into the country of the Seneca and to attack their forts; and they requested that the white people furnish them with munitions of war when payment was made for them. Hazard (Annals of Pa., 2d s., 342, 1850) evidently errs in calling these allies of the Susquehanna "Swedish Minquas," probably because he did not know that the Erie or some of their allied tribes bore this name.

It is thus seen that the number and position of the tribes marked on the "Carte Figurative" confirm in large measure the view that the names of places with kings' houses placed on Smith's map under the general rubric "Sasquesahanoughs" were those of independent tribes or of the chief towns of such tribes in the valley of the Susquehanna. It was perhaps the lack of definite knowledge concerning them that compelled Smith to be silent about them in his text. With the final subjugation of the Susquehanna, representing the remnants of the tribes dwelling above them, in 1676, this period of the history of the Susquehanna valley is closed.

Subsequent to the year 1700 the valley of the Susquehanna became the habitat of many of the tribes subject to the Iroquois. The Shawnee, Conoy, Nanticoke, Delawares, Munsee, Mahican, Saponi, Tutelo, Tuscarora, and 12 or 15 other tribes were settled here at one time or another under the jurisdiction of the Five Nations.

Sutaio (singular, Sū'tai; the several attempted Cheyenne etymologies are of doubtful value, as the word is probably not of Cheyenne origin). An Algonquian tribe, residing in the 18th century, according to tradition, about James r., S. Dak., who were at war with the Cheyenne, their eastern neighbors, to whom they were closely related linguistically. The two tribes finally formed an alliance and crossed the Missouri together to the w., the Sutaio leading the advance. The Sutaio rapidly declined, but kept their separate identity until about the year 1850, when they were absorbed by the Cheyenne. They exist now only as a division of that tribe. They are probably identical with the Staitan (q. v.) of Lewis and Clark. See Cheyenne. (J. M.)

Suya. A settlement, apparently of the Opata, in the valley of Sonora r., Sonora, Mexico, visited by Coronado in 1540, on his way to Cibola. An outpost was established there on the removal of the Spanish force from Corazones. The town having become weakened by desertions while Coronado was in the northern country, as well as by the death of Melchior Diaz, its commander, the natives attacked it, killed some of the Spanish and Indian occupants, and burned the settlement to the ground. Swampy Ground Assiniboin. A division of the Assiniboin (Coles, Henry Thompson Jour., II, 523, 1897). Henry (1808) says that they "inhabit the strong wood w. of Fort Augustus, along Panbian [Pembina] r., never frequent the plains, and are excellent beaver hunters. Formerly they were very numerous, but frequent murders among themselves, and the ravages of the smallpox have reduced their number to about 30 tents. They are fully as much addicted to spirituous liquor as the Saulteurs."

Sweating and Sweat-houses. Few practices were so nearly universal among the Indians as the sweat-bath, probably known to every tribe n. of Mexico, although along the N. W. coast s. of the Eskimo territory it seems to have been superseded by bathing in the sea. The sweat-lodge is to this day common in most Indian villages and camps.

The type of the ordinary sweat-house seems to have been everywhere the same. Willow rods or other pliant stems were stuck into the ground and bent and fastened with withes into a hemispherical or oblong framework, which generally was large enough to accommodate several persons. A hole was dug conveniently near the door into which stones, usually heated outside, were dropped by means of forked sticks. These were sprinkled with water to generate steam. A temporary covering of blankets or skins made the inclosure tight. This was the sweat-house in its simplest form. The Delawares of Pennsylvania, according to Loskiel (Hist. Miss. United Breth., pt. 1, 108-9, 1794) in the 18th century had "in every town an oven, situated at some distance from the dwellings, built either of stakes and boards covered with sods, or dug in the side of a hill, and heated with some red-hot stones."

The construction of a sweat-house was usually attended with many rules and observances. Among the Ntlakyapamuk or Thompson Indians (Teit), the door must always face the E. Among the Kiowa (Mooney) the framework consisted always of twelve supports. Formerly among the southern Plains tribes a buffalo skull was placed on a small mound in front of the sweat-house, the mound being formed of earth excavated from the fireplace. In no tribe was the sweat-lodge made except according to prescribed rules.

In permanent villages a more roomy and substantial house was made, and the stout framework was covered by the Ntlakyapamuk with bark or pine-needles and with earth. Among the Eskimo, according to Nelson, a kashim was used for the sweat-bath, a large permanent structure that was the "center of social and religious life" in every village. In California the sweat-house was a permanent structure, semisubterranean or earth-covered. Except in the extreme N. E. part of the state, heat was produced directly by a fire, never by steam. In some cases the sweat-house was more or less merged with the communal ceremonial chamber, the same structure being used for both purposes. Like the Pueblo kiva, it sometimes partook of the character of a men's club-house or working or lounging place. It was sometimes entered or used by women for ceremonial purposes, but never for sweating. In N. W. California it was the regular sleeping place of adult males, who never passed the night in the living house. The use of the sweat-house in California was always more or less associated or tinged with religious motives, but the fact that it was a regular practice, and with some groups a daily habit, must not be lost sight of (Kroeber).

Among the Indian tribes methods of sweating seem to have been everywhere very similar. After a half-hour or more spent in the steaming air of the sweat-house, the bather plunged into the cold water of a stream, when one was near, and thus the function was ended. Among the Eskimo hot air was used in place of steam, and in Zuni, and probably in the pueblos generally, hot stones near the body furnished the heat. The practice of scraping the body with wooden or bone scrapers before leaving the sweat-house was common, and was perhaps simply a measure of cleanliness, for Beechey records that the Kaniagmiut Eskimo near Cook inlet do not employ scrapers, but rub themselves after the bath with grass and twigs.

There seem to have been three distinct purposes for which sweating was practised. First, it was a purely religious rite or ceremony for the purpose of purifying the body and propitiating spirits. A sweat-bath was always undergone by warriors preparing for war; among many tribes, by boys at the puberty age; and, perhaps generally, before any serious or hazardous undertaking. Such ceremonial baths were almost always attended by scarification or the mutilation of some part of the body. Teit states of the Ntlakyapamuk that while in the sweat-house the hunter "sang to his spirit." No doubt the offering of prayers in the sweat-house for success in various enterprises was a general custom. The religious motive probably gave rise to the practice, and it was by far the most important in the estimation of the Indian. Second, sweating was important in medical practice for the cure of disease. The underlying idea was doubtless analogous to its religious and ceremonial use, since it was intended to influence disease spirits and was usually prescribed by the shaman, who sang outside and invoked the spirits while the patient was in the sweat-house. It was sometimes the friends and relatives of the sick person who, assembled in the sweat-house, sang and prayed for the patient's recovery. Among the Plains tribes all priests who perform ceremonies have usually to pass through the sweat-house to be purified, and the sweating is accompanied by special rituals (Miss Fletcher). Whether the Indian's therapeutic theory was rational or irrational, sweating was an efficacious remedy in many diseases to which he was subject, though used with little discrimination. Third, it was often purely social and hygienic—a number of individuals entered the sweat-house together, apparently actuated only by social instinct and appreciation of the luxury of a steam bath. Boller says that the Sioux, after severe exertions on a hunt, resorted to the steam bath as a means of invigorating their tired bodies. This practice seems to have been very common among the Plains tribes. Mooney states that among the Kiowa, Arapaho, and Cheyenne sweating was an almost daily custom, frequently having no other purpose than to give pleasure. It is possible that this practice is modern and that the sweat-bath has lost some of its primitive importance and sacredness. (H. W. H.)

Swiat (Su'i-at). A Squawmish village community on the w. side of Howe sd., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Swift Bird. The half-Indian son of Chappelle, a trader of note on the Missouri, whose wife was a Teton Sioux; born at Chappelle cr., Hughes co., S. Dak., about 1842. He lived the Indian life with his mother's people, and was a member of the noted "Fool Soldier Band" that rescued the Shetak captives from White Lodge in Nov. 1862. Swift Bird was an intelligent, peace-loving man, a sub-chief and a recognized authority on the historical happenings about old Ft Pierre. He died in 1905. (D. R.)

Swino (Sui'-nō). A Chumashan village formerly in Ventura co., Cal., at a locality now called Punta de la Loma.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Swinomish. Said to be a subdivision of the Skagit, formerly on Whidbey id., N. W. Wash., now under the Tulalip school superintendency. The Skagit and Swinomish together numbered 268 in 1909.

Sba-lush.—Mallet in Ind. Aff. Rep., 198, 1877.

Swords. A term sometimes applied to certain long blades of flaked stone made and used by the aborigines. Such are the wonderful blades of chalcedony and obsidian employed ceremonially by certain California tribes, and the equally remarkable flint blades of the middle Mississippi Valley region. As none of these stone blades are so specialized as fully to warrant the use of the term "sword" in describing them, all are therefore classed as knives (q. v.). In early colonial literature frequent mention is made of the wooden swords of the tribes; but these weapons appear to have had nothing in their shape or manner of use to distinguish them from the flattish-bladed clubs intended to break or bruise rather than to cut or pierce. The term tomahawk is sometimes used as synonymous with sword, as in the words of Strachey, who, referring to the weapons of the Virginia Indians, says: "Their swordes be made of a kind of heavy wood which they have, much like such wooden instruments as our English women swingle their flax withall, and which they call monococks, as the salvages in Bariena, in the West Indies, call their(s) macanas, and be alike made; but oftentimes they use for swordes the horne of a deare put through a piece of wood in forme of a pickaxe. Some use a long stone sharpened at both ends, thrust through a handle of wood in the same manner, and these last they were wont to use instead of hatchetts to fell a tree, or cut any massy thing in sonder; but now, by trucking with us, they have thowsands of our iron hatchetts, such as they be" (Strachey, Virginia, Hakluyt Soc. Pub., vi, 106, 1849). See Daggers, Knives, Obsidian. (W. H. H.)

Sylalkoabsh (S'yi-lal-ko-absh). A Salish band, said to be subordinate to the Skopanish of Green r., W. Wash. (Mallet in Ind. Aff. Rep., 198, 1887). They are now with the Muckleshoot under the Tulalip school superintendency, but their number is not separately reported.

Symbolism. A symbol is an object or an action which conveys a meaning distinct from the actual concept corresponding to the object or to the action. By symbolism is meant either the quality of an object or action of having a symbolic meaning besides its proper meaning, or the tendency to connect symbolic meanings with objects or actions.

The symbolic tendencies of the North American Indians are very highly developed. They are strongest among the Indians of the S. W., of the Plains, and of the N. W. coast, and, on the whole, decrease in intensity toward the western plateaus and the N. Symbolism is found particularly in art, ritual, and mythology. One of the most characteristic aspects of primitive symbolism is found in decorative art, which at times serves purely decorative ends, but frequently is symbolic. The degree of symbolism varies considerably in different areas. In the semirealistic art of the N. Pacific coast, characteristic parts of animals are utilized as symbols of the whole animal—the beaver's incisors for the beaver, the killer-whale's fin for the killer-whale. Cases in which remoter associations prevail are few and uncertain. The joint, represented by the "eye" pattern, stands sometimes for the idea "power of motion." In California and in the interior of British Columbia, where highly developed geometrical decoration of basketry occurs, the symbolic significance is ordinarily so slight that we may rather speak of pattern names than of symbolic meaning of design. The triangle may be called a mountain; a zigzag line, a snake; a meandric pattern, waves of the sea; a rectangular line, the leg of a lizard; a series of acute angles, flying birds. Similar names occur in the folk-art of more advanced people. Thus the Shetland islanders give their patterns names of "flowers"; and thus has the Mexican woman names for her patterns in drawn-work. It is hardly possible to draw a sharp line between pattern names and a stronger feeling for symbolic significance of a design. That the tendency is markedly present in California and on the plateaus of British Columbia is shown, for instance, by rock-paintings in which a semicircular line with ray-like divergent lines represents an unfinished basket, and symbolizes industry and perseverance; or in the decoration of war-axes, which represent the woodpecker and symbolize the striking-power of its beak.

Symbolic significance is much more highly developed on the Great Plains, and still more in the S. W. Its development in this area is so peculiar that it seems likely that one must look for the origin of this strong symbolistic tendency in the relations between the Mississippi basin and the S. The decorative elements of which designs are composed are largely triangles and squares, but their meanings show an endless variety. Thus the triangle or semicircle, with a number of lines descending from its base, conveys the idea to the Pueblo Indian of the beneficent rain-cloud and raindrops; or, to the Plains Indian, of a mountain and springs streaming down from it; to other tribes, the idea of the bear's foot, and thus of the bear himself. A straight line in dark color, interrupted by a few light spots, may be a trail on the prairie interrupted by gulches, or the path of life. Each tribe has its own style of symbolic interpretation of similar designs. In the S. W., ideas relating to rain, water, and fertility prevail; among the Sioux men the symbolic significance relates to war; among the Shoshoni, geometric designs tend to become pictures of events happening in a certain geographic environment; but more abstract ideas, like prayers for life, thoughts, etc., are not absent. The more important in the social or religious life of a people an object is, the more important also is the symbolic value of its decoration.

The question as to whether the symbolic ornament should be considered as a conventionalized representation of the symbol which was originally shown in a realistic manner, or whether the geometrical ornament was given a symbolic meaning by reinterpretation, has been much discussed. There is little doubt that both lines of development have occurred with great frequency, but that reinterpretation has been more common in North America. This may be inferred from the similarity of style in different parts of the continent, and the variety of symbolic interpretation.

In a few cases the symbolic interpretation of decorative elements has become so definitely fixed that we may recognize the beginnings of ideographic writing. Cases of this kind are found in the so-called "calendar histories" of North American Indians, and also in symbolic objects used in definite ceremonials. Thus the associations between the colors and certain quarters of the world among the Southern tribes; between red and blood among the Sioux (see Color symbolism); between an arrow and prayer among the Huichol; that of the triangle as rain-cloud in the S. W.—seem so fixed that their symbolic significance may be read without hesitation.

Symbolism is not confined to decorative art, but appears also in other arts. In music, rhythm has very often symbolic significance; as, for instance, in the $\frac{3}{4}$ rhythm of the N. Pacific coast, which is confined strictly to songs of the highest societies of the winter-dances. The burden of songs is almost always associated with definite ideas conveyed by the song. It is not certain whether or not a symbolic meaning of musical phrases and scales exists in America.

The dance is very often symbolic in so far as motion or gestures are associated with distantly related concepts: like the crouching of a dancer to express his submissiveness, heavy steps symbolizing the weight of the wealth that he carries; or a circuit contrary to the custom of the tribe, signifying his greatness, which permits him to disregard the customs of everyday life.

Symbolism in poetry is highly developed; and it is found that very often the meaning of songs is entirely unintelligible unless its symbolic meaning is explained. There is hardly an exception to this rule among the songs of American Indians, even among tribes that have no strongly developed symbolism in decorative art. The numerous songs of the Hako ceremony of the Pawnee and those of the ceremonials of the N. W. coast are examples of symbolism of poetry.

Symbolism plays an important part in rituals in so far as acts signify or are intended to bring about a result different from the act itself. Thus, smoking is a symbol of prayer, the shooting of an arrow symbolizes the sending of a prayer to the deity, painting with red paint signifies the bestowal of vigor, playing cat's-cradle symbolizes capture of the sun, success in gambling symbolizes the success of the player in other undertakings. In many cases the objects used in rituals are themselves symbols. On the N. Pacific coast, cedar-bark dyed red is the symbol of the winter-dance; cedar-bark undyed, the symbol of purification; the skin head-dress, that of the summer season; among the Pawnee the corn symbolizes "the omniscience which the earth is believed to possess" (Fletcher in 22d Rep. B. A. E., 289, 1904). The flat pipe of the Arapaho, the sacred bundles of the Plains Indians, the sacred objects of the Pueblos—all are symbols of supernatural powers or of supernatural beings (see Palladium). Among those tribes that possess an elaborate systematized cult, the symbolism of rituals is often highly developed; so much so, that the whole ritual may represent elaborate mythical concepts.

In magic, purely symbolic actions are not so frequent. A symbolic action performed on an object connected in some real or imaginary material way with the person or animal to be affected contains a new psychological element not present in the concept of symbolism. The swinging of a bullroarer in which is contained a hair of the person to be affected, and which is believed to produce dizziness, is a case of sympathy rather than of symbolism, although it contains clearly a symbolic element.

Whether or not mythology may be considered as primarily symbolic is a question difficult to decide. If myths, in their original forms, are attempts to explain nature, they must have contained important symbolic elements; but the present condition of American mythology, even among those tribes that possess an elaborate systematic mythology, does not favor this theory. The symbolic significance of the myth seems rather adventitious than primary, in the same manner in which the symbolic significance of decorative art seems more often rather adventitious than due to a development from realistic form to conventional form. In many cases the primary element seems to be the tale; the adventitious element, the symbolic interpretation of the tale. It seems that with the strong growth of ritual and its symbolic actions the symbolic significance of mythology develops, and that the priests in charge of rituals are largely responsible for the wealth of symbolism of the mythology of the southern plains and of the Pueblo region. In all other cases American myths seem to be taken in a remarkably matter-of-fact way.

It appears, therefore, that American symbolism is much more a phenomenon of action than of opinion; that it develops most strongly in artistic productions and in religious rites. (F. B.)

Sypouria. An unidentified Southern "nation" and river, perhaps mythical. The Sypouria r. is marked on Coxe's map (Carolina, 12, 1741) as a w. affluent of the Meschacébé (Mississippi), joining it below the territory of the Mosopele tribe, and 15 leagues above Chongue r., which flows into it from the E. The name is possibly another form of Mosopelea (q.v.).

Ta (T'ā, 'chiton' [?]). A Haida town formerly on the E. coast of North id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It is said to have been occupied by a small family called, after the name of the place, Taahl-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Tabin. A tribe mentioned by Langsdorff (Voy., II, 163, 1814) as inhabiting the coast of California. It seemingly belonged to the Costanoan family.

Tabira (Ta-bi-ra'). A former pueblo of the Tompiros, a division of the Piros (q. v.), situated at the southern apex of the Mesa de los Jumanos, N. E. of the present Socorro, central N. Mex. The ruins are commonly known as Gran Quivira, a name erroneously applied in the latter half of the 19th century because of their supposed identification with the Quivira (q. v.) of Coronado and Oñate in the 16th and 17th centuries. A Spanish mission was established at Tabira in 1629 by Fray Francisco de Acevedo, which still existed in 1644, but the two churches and monasteries (one commenced between 1629 and 1644, the other probably between 1660 and 1670) were perhaps never completed. The walls are still standing. The pueblo was permanently abandoned between 1670 and 1675 on account of persistent depredations by the Apache, who were responsible for the depopulation of all the Pueblo villages E of the Rio Grande in this section. The inhabitants of Tabira fled to Socorro and Alamillo, N. Mex., for safety, finally finding their way to the vicinity of El Paso, Tex. Judging by the extent of the ruins, the former population of Tabira probably did not exceed 1,500. Consult Bandelier in *Arch. Inst. Taboo. A Polynesian term (ta'bu) applied to an interdiction proper to or laid upon a person, place, day, name, or any conceivable thing, which is thereby rendered sacred and communication with it except to a few people or under certain circumstances forbidden. It was formerly so striking an institution, and was in consequence so frequently mentioned by explorers and travelers, that the word has been adopted into English both as applying to similar customs among other races and in a colloquial sense. Its negative side, being the more conspicuous, became that indicated by the adopted term; but religious prohibitions among primitive peoples being closely bound up with others of a positive character, it is often applied to the latter as well, and writers frequently speak of the taboos connected with the killing of a bear or a bison, or the taking of a salmon, meaning thereby the ceremonies then performed, both positive and negative. In colloquial English usage the term taboo has ceased to have any religious significance.

Whether considered in its negative or in its positive aspect this term may be applied in North America to a number of regulations observed at definite periods of life, in connection with important undertakings, either by individuals or by considerable numbers of persons. Such were the regulations observed by boys and girls at puberty; by parents before the birth of a child; by relatives after the decease of a person; by hunters and fishermen in the pursuit of their occupations; by boys desiring guardian spirits or wishing to become shamans; by shamans and chiefs desiring more power, or when curing the sick, prophesying, endeavoring to procure food by supernatural means, or "showing their power" in any manner; by novitiates into secret societies, and by leaders in society or tribal dances in preparation for them. Among the Lillooet, on the first day of the berry-picking season, only enough berries for that day were gathered, under the impression that gathering more would bring misfortune. Among the Kutchin those who prepared bodies for burial were under certain restriction for some time afterward, and widows and widowers among many tribes suffered similarly. The telling of stories also was tabooed at certain seasons. In tribes divided into totemic clans or gentes each individual was often called on to observe certain regulations in regard to his totem animal. This custom, as among the Yuchi and the Navaho, for example, sometimes took the form of an absolute prohibition against killing the totem animal; but at other times it merely involved an apology to the animal or abstinence from eating certain parts of it. The negative prohibitions, those which may be called the taboos proper, consisted in abstinence from hunting, fishing, war, women, sleep, certain kinds of work, and so forth, but above all in abstinence from eating, while among positive accompaniments may be mentioned washing, sweat-bathing, flagellation, and the taking of emetics and other medicines.

In the majority of American tribes the name of a dead man was not uttered—unless in some altered form—for a considerable period after his demise, and sometimes, as among the Kiowa, the custom was carried so far that names of common animals or other terms in current use were entirely dropped from the language because of the death of a person bearing such a name. Frequently it was considered improper for a man to mention his own name, and the mention of the personal name was avoided by wives and husbands in addressing each other, and sometimes by other relatives as well. But the most common regulation of this kind was that which decreed that a man should not address his mother-in-law directly, or vice versa, and the prohibition of intercourse often applied to fathers-in-law and daughters-in-law also.

The objects of these prohibitions, whether voluntary or otherwise, were as numerous as human desires or human fears. In Polynesia the taboo was largely a method of government, and fear of retribution from both supernatural and mundane sources was the direct cause of the obedience yielded to it. It is not so easy, however, to separate the regulations in America to which this term has been applied, and which were governed by fear of nonfulfilment, from those in which the motive was a desire for additional benefits. Thus omission of the customary puberty, birth, mortuary, war, and hunting regulations no doubt would be considered as inviting certain misfortune, but in most of these there was what may be termed a sliding scale of observance, resulting in a greater or lesser amount of good fortune—or more likelihood of good fortune—in proportion to fuller or more meager observance of such regulations. Then there were other regulations, as those voluntarily adopted by chiefs on the N. Pacific coast who desired more wealth, or those accepted by shamans desiring more power, the omission of which would have occasioned them no loss of the prosperity they were already enjoying. It will be seen that taboo is one aspect of religious phenomena known by many other names and, at least among the lower races, is almost as broad as religion itself. See Religion. (J. R. S.)

Tabo-Piba ('rabbit [and] tobacco'). A phratral group of the Hopi, consisting of the Rabbit, Jack-rabbit, and Tobacco clans. They claim to have come from a region in s. Arizona called Palatkwabi, and from Little Colorado r.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 583, 1900. See Piba, Tabo.

Tacahlay. One of the Diegueño rancherías represented in the treaty of 1852 at Santa Isabel, s. Cal.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 132, 1857.

Tacaho. See Tuckahoe.

Tacame. A Coahuiltecan tribe living in the 18th century near the lower San Antonio and Nueces rs., Texas. In 1728 Rivera referred to them as living in that neighborhood, and described them, together with the Pampopa, Pastia, and others, as unwarlike wanderers who subsisted on fish and sylvan products (Proyecto, estado 3, ¶ 43). The Tacame entered San Francisco de la Espada mission soon after its foundation, but proved very troublesome by running away. In 1737 they fled to the Colorado r. and established a rancheria which, it was said, consisted of 200 persons. When Governor Sandoval and Father Yzasmendi went after them, they resisted, but 42 were captured and taken back to their mission (Testimony in Archivo Gen., Misiones, xxi, exp. 2, fol. 19). In a short time they again fled, leaving their mission deserted (Lamar Papers, MS. dated 1738); they expressed a desire to go to San Antonio de Valero mission, and were given permission to do so. A few embraced the opportunity, but more of them entered mission Nuestra Señora de la Purísima Concepción, where, after 1741, they lived in considerable numbers (Concepción Marriage Records, passim.). In 1762, 1780, and 1793, respectively, they were reported as still at this mission. In a report of 1780, Governor Cabello gave the habitat of the tribe as near the coast between San Antonio and Nueces rs., the neighborhood where they were first encountered by the Spaniards. The Tacames, said by Solís to have been at San José mission near San Antonio, are evidently the same people. (H. E. B.)

Tacatacuru. A river, an island, and probably a village of the Saturiba tribe of N. E. Florida, about 1565. The river is said by Laudonnière to be the one the French called the Seine (Sequana), apparently identical with the St Marys, forming the boundary between Florida and Georgia. The island was evidently what is now Cumberland id. The village is not marked on the De Bry map of 1591 accompanying Le Moyne's Narrative, and may have been either on the N. (Georgia) or S. (Florida) side, but the chief is always mentioned in the French narrative as a kinsman or ally of the "great king Satourioua." Brinton incorrectly locates it on the coast S. of St Augustine, probably confusing it with Tukururu, named by Fray Francisco Pareja in 1612 as one of the Timucuan dialects. (J. M.)

Tachi. One of the larger tribes of the Yokuts (Mariposan) family, living on the plains N. of Tulare lake, S. central Cal. They held the country W. of the Coast range. Powers puts them on Kings r., near Kingston. According to Alexander Taylor, members of this tribe were brought to San Antonio and Dolores (San Francisco) missions as neophytes. Tatché or Telamé is mentioned by Shea (preface to Arroyo de la Cuesta's Vocab. of S. Antonio mission) as the name of the tribe speaking the San Antonio language, a Salinan dialect. These Tatché and Telamé, however, are the Tachi and Telamni who had been taken to the mission, and Taylor may be correct in giving Sextapay as the name of the tribe, or more correctly village site, originally at San Antonio. As is the case with all the Yokuts tribes, only a fragment of the former number remains; but though reduced to a few dozen survivors, the Tachi are today among the half-dozen most numerous tribes left of the original forty or more comprising the Yokuts stock. Most of the survivors occupy a settlement near Lemoore, Kings co. (A. L. K.)

Tadji-lanas (Tā'dji lā'nas, or Tās lā'nas, 'sand-town people'). Two important Haida families belonging to the Raven clan. It would probably be truer to say that they were two parts of one family, although they came to be widely separated geographically. According to tradition this family and 4 others once lived together in a town near Sand Spit pt., Queen Charlotte ids., composed of 5 rows of houses. Those in the front row were called Tadji-lanas, because they were close to the beach; those in the next, Kuna-lanas ('Point-town people'), because their row ran out on a point; those in the third, Yaku-lanas ('Middle-town people'), because they occupied the middle row; those in the fourth, Koetas ('Earth-eaters'), because they lived near the trails where it was very muddy; and those in the fifth, Stlenga-lanas ('Rear-town people'), because they lived farthest back. Another tradition relates that this family, together with the Kagials-kegawai of Skedans, sprang from a woman who was on House id. (Atana) when it rose out of the flood. One branch were reckoned among the Gunghet-haidagai, and a subdivision called Kaidju-kegawai owned the southernmost town on the island. By a curious coincidence the northern division, after living for a while on the N. W. coast of Graham id., came to occupy Kasaan in Alaska, the most northerly Haida town. The Gunghet branch is almost extinct. (J. R. S.)

Taensa. A tribe related in language and customs to the Natchez, from whom they must have separated shortly before the beginning of the historic period. There is reason to think that part of the Taensa were encountered by De Soto in 1540, but the first mention of them under their proper name is by La Salle and his companions, who visited them in 1682 on their way to the mouth of the Mississippi. They were then living on L. St Joseph, an ox-bow cut-off of the Mississippi in the present Tensas parish, La. Tonti stopped at their villages in 1686 and 1690, and in 1698 they were visited by Davion, La Source, and De Montigny, the last of whom settled among them as missionary the following year. In 1700 Iberville found him there, and the two returned together to the Natchez, De Montigny having decided to devote his attention to that tribe. St Cosme, who soon succeeded De Montigny among the Natchez, considered the Taensa too much reduced for a separate mission, and endeavored, without success, to draw them to the Natchez. In 1706 the fear of an attack from the Yazoo and Chickasaw induced the Taensa to abandon their settlements and take refuge with the Bayougoula, whom they soon after attacked treacherously and almost destroyed. After they had occupied several different positions along the Mississippi southward of the Manchac, Bienville invited them to settle near Mobile and assigned them lands not far from his post. They remained here many years, giving their name to Tensaw r.; but in 1764, rather than pass under the English, they removed to Red r., in company with a number of the other small tribes in their neighborhood. The same year, in company with the Apalachee and Pakana, they applied to the French commandant for permission to settle on Bayou La Fourche; but, though it was granted, neither they nor the Apa-lachee appear to have taken advantage of it. They remained at first on Red r., but in a few years removed to Bayou Boeuf. About the time when Louisiana passed under control of the United States they sold these lands also and moved to the northern end of Grand lake, where a small bayou bears their name. As an independent tribe they have now disappeared, though some Chitimacha Indians are descended from them. The Taensa were always a comparatively small tribe. In 1698 De Montigny estimated them at 700, and two years later Iberville placed the number of their warriors at 300, while in 1702 he assigned them 150 families, a figure also given by St Cosme the year before. Du Pratz (1718-34) placed the number of their cabins after their removal to Mobile at 100, probably an overestimate. The "Little Taensas" spoken of by Iberville were evidently the Avoyelles (q. v.). In 1699 a Taensa Indian gave Iberville the following list of villages belonging to his people, but most of the names are evidently in the Mobilian trade language: Taensas, Chaoucoulas, Conchayon, Couthaugoula, Nyhougoulas, Ohytoucoulas, and Talaspa.

The Taensa have attained a unique interest in modern times from an attempt of two French seminarists to introduce a product of their own ingenuity as a grammar of the Taensa language. The deception was exposed by Brinton in 1885, but for a while it gave rise to a heated controversy. See Pseudo-Indian. Consult Swanton (1) in Am. Anthr., x, 24, 1908, and authors therein cited; (2) in Bull. 43, B. A. E., 1910. (J. R. S.)

Taensa. The chief one of the 7 Taensa villages in 1699.—Iberville in Margry, Déc., iv, 179, 1880.

Tagasoke (Ta-ga-soke, 'forked like a spear'). An Oneida village formerly on Fish cr., near Vienna, Oneida co., N. Y.—Morgan, League Iroq., 473, map, 1851.

Tagish. A small tribe living about Tagish and Marsh lakes, Brit. Col. They are classed with the Tlingit stock on the basis of a vocabulary obtained by Dawson (Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., 192B, 1887); but as they resemble the interior Athapaskan Indians in every other respect, it is likely that they have adopted their present language from the Chilkat. They are probably part of Dall's "Nehaunee of the Chilkat river." (J. R. S.)

Stick Indians.—Dawson in Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., 192B, 1887 (coast name for these people and all other interior Indians). Tahk-heesh.—Schwatka in Century Mag., 747, Sept. 1885. Tank-heesh.—Ibid., 743 (may be the Takon of Schwatka).

Taguanate. An unidentified province and town near which Moscoso, after the death of De Soto, built his boats and embarked on the Mississippi in the summer of 1543. According to Lewis (in Span. Explorers, 1528-1543, 252, 1907) the Taguanate province was on White r., and the town was probably in the s. part of Monroe co., Ark., possibly at Indian Bay.

Taguanate.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in Span. Explorers, op. cit., 250. Taguanate.—Ibid., 251.

Tagui. Given as a village near the headwaters of San Luis Rey r., San Diego co., Cal., in 1795 (Grijalva cited by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 563, 1886). Probably the same as Taqui, mentioned by Sanchez in 1821 (ibid., ii, 443) as existing 7 or 8 m. N. of Santa Isabel; and as Tahwie, a Diegueño rancheria represented in the treaty of Santa Isabel, s. Cal., in 1852 (H. R. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 132, 1857). Kroeber (inf'n, 1907) regards the name as possibly a misprint of Pawi (Spanish Pagui or Pahui), the Luiseno name of Cahuilla valley, the present Cahuilla res. just N. of the headwaters of San Luis Rey r.

Taguta. Given as a Kaiyukhotana village on the N. bank of Yukon r., 15 m. below the Kaiyuh mouth, Alaska.

Tagutakaka.—Raymond in Sen. Ex. Doc. 12, 42d Cong., 1st sess., 25, 1871.

Tagwahi (Tagwá'hí, 'Catawba place'). The name of several Cherokee settlements. One of them, known to the whites as Toccoa, was situated on Toccoa cr., E. of Clarkesville, Habersham co., Ga.; another was on Toccoa or Ocoee r., about the present Toccoa, in Fannin co., Ga., and a third may have been on Persimmon cr., which is known to the Cherokee as Tagwá'hí, and enters Hiwassee r. some distance below Murphy, in Cherokee co., N. C.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 533, 1900.

Tocoah.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887.

Tahagmiut ('people of the shadow,' that is, living toward the sunset). An Eskimo tribe inhabiting the Labrador shore of Hudson str. from Leaf r. W., and the coast of Hudson bay S. to Mosquito bay. They are tall and of fine physique, the men larger on the average than whites, the women equal to the average white women. Their customs are primitive. Men hold women in little respect, but are jealous of their wives. They are fond of games and athletic sports, and both sexes are passionate gamblers. They trap foxes, wolves, and wolverenes, exchanging the furs for guns, ammunition, cutlery, and hardware at Ft Chimo, distant a whole winter's journey for a dog team. The skirts of their coats are hung with pear-shaped pieces of ivory that rattle when they walk.

Iglumiut.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 462, 1888 ('people of the other side': so called by the Eskimo of Baffin land, on the opposite shore of Hudson str.). Iglu-miut.—Boas in Trans. Anthr. Soc. Wash., III, 95, 1885. Northerners.—Turner in 11th Rep. B. A. E., 177, 1894 (so called by the whites of Labrador). Tahagmyut.—Turner in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. 1887, sec. II, 101, 1888. Tahág myut.—Turner in 11th Rep. B. A. E., 177, 1894. Ungavamiut.—Boas in Am. Antiq., 40, 1888.

Tahapit. A Maricopa rancheria on the Rio Gila, Ariz., in 1744.—Sedelmair (1744) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889.

Tahattawan. See Nattahattawants.

Tahchee (Tátsi', 'Dutch'). A Western Cherokee chief, one of the earliest emigrants to the Arkansas country to join chief Bowl. After several years in Texas, during which he led war parties against the wilder tribes, he recrossed Red r. and soon made himself so conspicuous in raids on the Osage that a reward of $500 was offered by Gen. Arbuckle for his capture. To show his defiance of the proclamation, he deliberately journeyed to Ft Gibson, attacked a party of Osage at a trading post near by, and scalped one of them within hearing of the drums of the fort. With rifle in one hand and the bleeding scalp in the other, he leaped a precipice and made his escape, although a bullet grazed his cheek. On promise of amnesty and the withdrawal of the reward, he returned and settled with his followers on the Canadian, s. w. of Ft Gibson, establishing a reputation among army officers as a valuable scout and guide. His portrait was painted by Catlin in 1834. See Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., pt. 1, 1900; McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, I, 251-260, 1858; Catlin, North Am. Inds., II, 121, 122, 1844.

Tah-gah-jute. See Logan.

Tahiannihouq. An unidentified village or tribe mentioned in 1687 to Joutel (Margry, Déc., III, 409, 1878) while he was staying with the Kadohadacho on Red r. of Louisiana, by the chief of that tribe, as being among his enemies.

Tahjuas. A Chumashan village formerly near Santa Inés mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Tahlasi (Ta'lasí'). A former Cherokee settlement on Little Tennessee r., about Talassee ford, in Blount co., Tenn. The name has lost its meaning. (J. M.)

Ta'lasí'.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., pt. 1, 533, 1900. Talassée.—Doc. of 1755 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 142, 1887. Tallase.—Bartram, Travels, 371, 1792. Telassée.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce, op. cit., 144. Tellassée.—Timberlake, Memoirs, map, 1765.

Tahlequah (Talikwá', meaning lost). The capital of the Cherokee Nation, in N. E. Indian Ter., now incorporated with the state of Oklahoma. The name, corrupted in the E. to Tellico (q. v.), is an old Cherokee town name, and was formally adopted for the new capital in 1839 on the reunion and reorganization of the Old Settler and Emigrant bands of Cherokee in the W. Tahlequah is now an enterprising railroad town of about 4,000 inhabitants, and contains, among other buildings, the former Cherokee capitol and a large Cherokee female seminary. Park Hill, the seat of the old Cherokee mission press, is a few miles distant. Consult Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., pt. 1, 1900.

Tahlkoedi ('people of Tahlko,' where they once camped). A division of the Raven phratry of the Stikine in Alaska.

Détik-óé'dé.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 25, 1889. Talch-kūēdi.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 120, 1885. Tálqoe'dí.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904. Tal-qua-tee.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859.

Tahltan. The southwesternmost tribal division of the Nahane Indians of the Athapaskan family. Their hunting grounds include the drainage basin of Stikine r. and its tributaries as far as the mouth of Iskut r., Dease lake, and the river halfway to McDanes cr. (but according to the old law the head of Dease lake was Kaska territory, and this assumption of rights has never been acknowledged by the Kaska people), the northern sources of the Nass, and some of the southern branches of the Taku, in Alaska and British Columbia. In early days the salmon streams flowing into the Stikine from the n., from 4 m. below Glenora to, but not including, Telegraph cr., were claimed and fished by the Stikine tribe of Tlingit, but this overlapping of the two peoples seems to have produced little friction, possibly because the Tahltan had no living places hereabouts, and in the matter of the exchange of the products of the coast and the interior it was of mutual advantage to keep on friendly terms.

The Tahltan have always lived on the upper reaches of the Stikine and near by on the Tahltan and Tuya rs. In early days their living places were used more as storage depots and were resorted to through the summer months for salmon fishing, which was also the season of ease and feasting, when the pursuit of the fur-bearing animals was without profit—for the Tahltan people have always been hunters and trappers, living in the open throughout the year, meat eaters through necessity and choice, and accepting fish diet only as a change.

The primitive houses were similar to those found in the fishing camps to-day; they were constructed of stout saplings stuck upright in the ground and bound together with bark rope or tree roots and roofed over with slabs of spruce bark. But in camp the typical shelter was a lean-to of bark and brush laid over poles, two being placed opposite each other, with a central fire. To-day, throughout most of the year, they live in the same manner, except that canvas has superseded the bark and brush covering.

After the Cassiar gold excitement in 1874 they built a substantial log village on level space upward of a mile and a half from the junction of the Tahltan with the Stikine, which is generally known as Tahltan, though its native name is Goon-tdar-shaga ('where the spring water stops'). The only other native settlement is at Telegraph Creek, where a number of small log houses have been built to keep pace with the growth of the white settlement.

The social organization of the Tahltan without doubt has developed from association with the coast Tlingit. It is founded on matriarchy and is dependent on the existence of two exogamous parties who intermarry. These parties may be designated, from their totemic emblems, as Cheskea (Raven) and Cheona (Wolf). These are subdivided into families, which assume all the functions of the party and supplement each other at all meetings and on all occasions of ceremony. The family is the unit of social and political life, in which all individuality is merged, succession follows, and inheritance is secured. The families are:

(1) Tuckclarwaydee, of the Wolf party, which, besides having the wolf emblem, is represented by the brown bear, the eagle, and the killer-whale. It originated in the interior about the headwaters of Nass r. This family is credited with having been the first to settle in this country and the founders of the Tahltan tribe.

(2) Nanyiee, of the Wolf party, which, besides having the wolf emblem, is represented by the brown bear, the killer-whale, and the shark. The original home of this people was in the interior, about the headwaters of Taku r., which they descended to salt water and settled among the Stikine Tlingit; in later years they ascended Stikine r. and became a family of the Tahltan, while others crossed the trail in still more recent times and joined their brethren.

(3) Talarkoteen of the Wolf party, represented by the wolf crest. They originated in the interior, about Peace r., and followed down Liard r. to Dease lake and then crossed to the Tuya. They are nearly extinct.

(4) Kartchottee, of the Raven party, represented by both the raven emblem and that of the frog. This family originated in the interior toward the headwaters of the Taku. Some of the family married among the Tahltan in early days. Another branch descended Stikine r. long ago, affiliated with the Kake tribe of the Tlingit people, and generations later their descendants followed up the Stikine and became Tahltan. This is now the most numerous family of the tribe.

The Tahltan live by hunting and trapping. The country is rich in fur-bearing animals and big game. In late years, since hunters have been attracted thither, they have earned considerable as guides, besides working for the trading companies' pack-teams. They are an adaptable people, who are fast giving up the traditions of the past for the luxuries of civilization, with which their earnings supply them, and in the course of a few years there will be little left of their more primitive life. They numbered 229 in 1909, and have reached that stage where they are holding their own. They are of medium stature, spare rather than stout, and have high cheek-bones, full mouth, aquiline nose rather broad at the base, small hands and feet, coarse black hair, and mild and pleasant expression. On the whole they are an honest, agreeable, kindly people, hospitably inclined and dignified in bearing. In many instances their admixture with the Tlingit is expressed in their features, producing a much less pleasing type. In addition to the authors cited below, consult Teit in Boas Anniv. Talla ('crane.'—Hewitt). An unidentified village on the St. Lawrence, near the present city of Quebec, in 1535.—Cartier (1535), Bref Récit, 32, 1863.

Taimah (also Taiomah, Tama, properly Taima, 'sudden crash' [of thunder].—Wm. Jones. The name has been mis-translated "The bear whose voice makes friendly toward the whites, on one occasion when a vindictive Indian had started on a long journey for the purpose of killing the Indian agent at Prairie du Chien, Wis., Taimah hastened to him and by a timely warning saved his life. He was one of the signers of the treaty with the Sauk and Foxes at Washington, Aug. 4, 1824, in which his name appears as "Fai-mah, the Bear." He died among his people a few years later. The county and town of Tama, Ia., preserve his name.

Taimamares. A former tribe of s. Texas, probably Coahuiltecan, associated with the Gueliquesales, Manos Prietas, Bocores, Haeser, Pinanacas, Escabas, Cacastes, Cocobiptas, Cocomaque, Codame, Contotores, Colorados, and Babiamares in 1675 (Fernando del Bosque, 1675, trans. in Nat. Geog. Mag., xiv, 340, 1903). They are probably identical with the Teneinamar. Cf. Tumamamar.

Taisida (Tai'-si-da). A former Maidu village a few miles s. e. of Marysville, Yuba co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, map, 1905.

Taiyanyanokhotana. A division of Kaiyukhotana living on Kuskokwim r., Alaska. Pop. 210 in 1890, 122 males and 88 females. Their chief villages, situated near the Russian trading post of Kolmakof, were Napai and Akmiut.

Tai-yā-yān'-o-khotān'-ā.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 26, 1877.

Magdalena Tajicaranga.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 319, 1864.

the rocks to tremble"). A subordinate chief of the Fox tribe, and member of the Thunder clan, for some years ruler and law-giver of a Fox village a short distance above the mouth of Flint cr., near the site of Burlington, Ia. He was also a prominent medicine-man. Always Tajique (probably the Hispanized form of the Tewa name (Tashi'ke?) of the pueblo, the Tigua name being Tûsh-yit-yay, or Tuh-yityay.—Bandelier). A former Tigua pueblo about 30 m. n. e. of Belen, the ruins of which are situated on the n. and w. border of the present settlement of the same name, on the s. bank of the Arroyo de Tajique, in central New Mexico. It was the seat of the mission of San Miguel, established probably in 1629. In 1674 its population, which then numbered about 300, was augmented by the addition of 600 Tigua from Quarai, who were compelled by the Apache to abandon their pueblo. Little peace, however, was found at Tajique, for in the following year this village also was permanently abandoned for the same cause, the inhabitants gradually drifting to El Paso. A remnant of the Tigua now living near the latter place claim to have come originally from Tajique and other pueblos in the n. Consult Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 257 et seq., 1892; Lummis, Land of Poco Tiempo, 1893. See Tigua. (F. W. H.) Junétre.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 118, 1871 (believed by Bandelier, Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 113, 1892, to be probably the same; not to be confounded with the Junetre of the Tewa). San Miguel Taxique.—Vetancourt (1696) in Teatro Mex., iii, 324, 1871. Tafique.—Escalante (1778) quoted by Bandelier in Arch. Papers, iv, 258, 1892. Tûsh-yit-yay.—Ibid. (this and the last form are given as the Isleta name of the pueblo.)

Takaiak. A Kaiyuhkhotana division and village e. of Yukon r., Alaska, near Nulato. Pop. 81 in 1844.

Letniki-Takaiak.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., xxi, map, 1850. Takaiaksa.—Tikhmenief quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 396, 1902. Takajaksen.—Holmberg quoted by Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 25, 1877.

Takamitka. A former Aleut village on Unalaska id., eastern Aleutians, Alaska.

Tatamitka.—Coxe, Russ. Discov., 164, 1787.

Takapsintonwanna ('village at the shiny ground'). A former band or village of the Wahpeton Sioux.

Takapsintona.—Riggs, letter to Dorsey, 1882. Takapsin-to^wanna.—Dorsey (after Ashley) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 216, 1897. Takapsin-ton^wanna.—Ibid.

Takashwangeroras. See Shikellamy.

Takasichekhwt (Tă-yas'-i-tce'-qwt). A former village of the Chastacosta on the n. side of Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 234, 1890.

Takatoka (corrupted from De'gătd'gă, a word which conveys the idea of two persons standing together, and so closely united as to form but one human body). A prominent early chief of the Western Cherokee. The name was also applied to Gen. Stand Watie (q. v.).—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 515, 1900.

Klaxermette.—Jackson, Rep. on Reindeer in Alaska, map, 145, 1894. Taksomut.—Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1899. Taksomute.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, map, 1884. Taksumut.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, map, 1877.

taktân-tân.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 118, 1885. T!a'qdentân.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Taxô'ska utsai' upô'.—Dorsey, Osage MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1883.

Takelma (from the native name Dă-gelmâ'n, 'those dwelling along the river'). A tribe which, together with the Upper Takelma (q. v.), or Lat'gă'wâ', forms the Takilman linguistic family of Powell. They occupy the middle portion of the course of Rogue r. in s. w. Oregon from and perhaps including Illinois r. to about Table Rock, the northern tributaries of Rogue r. between these limits, and the upper course of Cow cr. Linguistically they are very sharply distinguished from their neighbors, their language showing little or no resemblance in even general morphologic and phonetic traits to either the Athapaskan or the Klamath; it was spoken in at least two dialects. They seem to have been greatly reduced in numbers at the time of the Rogue River war; at the present day the few survivors, a half dozen or so, reside on the Siletz res., Oreg. J. O. Dorsey (Takelma MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884) gives the following list of village names: Hashkushtun, Hudedut, Kashtata, Kthotaime, Nakila, Salwahka, Seethltun, Sestikustun, Sewaathlchutun, Shkashtun, Skanowethltunne, Talmamiche, Talotunne, Tthowache, Tulsulsun, Yaasitun, and Yushlali. These are nearly all Athapaskan in form. The following native Takelma village names were procured by Dr Edward Sapir in 1906: Gelyalk (Gelyâlk'), Dilomi (Di'lômi), Gwenpunk (Gwenp'ufik'), Hayaalbalsda (Hayâ'lbâlsda), Daktgamik (Dak't'gamik'), Didalam (Di'dalâm), Daktsasin (Dak'ts!asiñ) or Daldanik, Hagwal (Hagwâl), Somouluk (S'ômô'lùk'), and Hatonk (Hat!ônk').

Culturally the Takelma were closely allied to the Shasta of n. California, with whom they frequently intermarried. Their main dependence for food was the acorn, which, after shelling, pounding, sifting, and seething, was boiled into a mush. Other vegetable foods, such as the camas root, various seeds, and berries (especially manzanita), were also largely used. Tobacco was the only plant cultivated. Of animal foods the chief was salmon and other river fish caught by line, spear, and net; deer were hunted by running them into an inclosure provided with traps. For winter use roasted salmon and cakes of camas and deer fat were stored away. The main utensils were a great variety of baskets (used for grinding acorns, sifting, cooking, carrying burdens, storage, as food receptacles, and for many other purposes), constructed generally by twining on a hazel warp. Horn, bone, and wood served as material for various implements, as spoons, needles, and root-diggers. Stone was hardly used except in the making of arrowheads and pestles. The house, quadrangular in shape and partly underground, was constructed of hewn timber and was provided with a central fireplace, a smoke-hole in the roof, and a raised door from which entrance was had by means of a notched ladder. The sweat-house, holding about six, was also a plank structure, though smaller in size; it was reserved for the men.

In clothing and personal adornment the Takelma differed but little from the tribes of N. California, red-headed-woodpecker scalps and the basket caps of the women being perhaps the most characteristic articles. Facial painting in red, black, and white was common, the last-named color denoting war. Women tattooed the skin in three stripes; men tattooed the left arm with marks serving to measure various lengths of strings of dentalia.

In their social organization the Takelma were exceedingly simple, the village, small in size, being the only important sociological unit; no sign of totemism or clan groupings has been found. The chieftaincy was only slightly developed, wealth forming the chief claim to social recognition. Feuds were settled through the intervention of a "go-between" hired by the aggrieved party. Marriage was entirely a matter of purchase of the bride and was often contracted for children or even infants by their parents. The bride was escorted with return presents by her relatives to the bridegroom's house; on the birth of a child an additional price was paid to her father. Though no law of exogamy prevailed beyond the prohibition of marriage of near kin, marriage was probably nearly always outside the village. Polygamy, as a matter of wealth, was of course found; the levirate prevailed. Corpses were disposed of by burial in the ground, objects of value being strewn over the grave.

No great ceremonial or ritual development was attained by the Takelma. The first appearance of salmon and acorns, the coming to maturity of a girl, shamanistic performances, and the war dance were probably the chief occasions for ceremonial activity. Great influence was exercised by the shamans, to whose malign power death was generally ascribed. Differing from the shamans were the dreamers, who gained their power from an entirely different group of supernatural beings and who were never thought to do harm. Characteristic of the Takelma was the use of a considerable number of charms or medicine formulas addressed to various animal and other spirits and designed to gain their favor toward the fulfilment of some desired event or the warding off of a threatened evil. The most characteristic myths are the deeds of the culture-hero (Daldäl) and the pranks of Coyote. For further information, consult Sapir (1) in Am. Anthr., ix, no. 2, 1907; (2) in *Jour. Am. Takokakaan (T'āq'q'āqā-ān, 'town at the mouth of Taku'). A Tlingit town of the Taku people in Alaska. (J. R. S.)

Takon. A subdivision of the Hankutchin, whose village is Nuklako.

Takoongoto (Ta-ko-ong'-o-to, 'high bank'). A subclan of the Delawares.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1878.

Takoulguehronnon. Mentioned in the middle of the 17th century (Jes. Rel. 1656, 34, 1858) as a tribe defeated by the Iroquois.

Takshak. A Ch'nagmiut Eskimo village on the N. bank of the Yukon, Alaska, near the delta. Cf. Chukchagemut.

Takshagemut.—Dall, Alaska, map, 1870. Taktchag-miut.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., XXI, map, 1850. Taktschagmiut.—Holmberg, Ethnog. Skizz., map, 1855.

Taku. A Tlingit tribe on the river and inlet of the same name, Stevens channel, and Gastineau channel, Alaskan coast. They were said to number 2,000 in 1869, 269 in 1880, and only 223 in 1890. Their winter towns are Sikanasankian and Takokakaan. Social divisions are Ganahadi, Tsatenyedi, and Yenyedi. A tradition, seemingly well founded, places the ancient home of most of these people in the interior, higher up Taku r. An Athapascan tribe was known by the same name. See Takutine.

Takulli ('people who go upon the water'). An ethnic group of Athapascan tribes, under Babine and Upper Skeena agency, inhabiting the upper branches of Fraser r. and as far S. as Alexandria, Brit. Col. They are described (Can. Ind. Aff., 210, 1909) as consisting of 19 bands, all of the Hagwilget or Dené nation. Hale (Ethnol. and Philol., 201, 1846) described them as occupying the country from 52° 30' N., bordering on the Shuswap to 56°, being separated from the Sekani on the E. by the Rocky mts. and on the W. by the Coast range. Anderson (Hist. Mag., VII, 75, 1863) located them approximately between 52° and 57° N. and 120° and 127° W. Drake (Bk. Inds., VIII, 1848) placed them on Stuart lake. Buschmann (Athapask. Sprachst., 152, 1889) located them on the upper Fraser r., Brit. Col. The British Columbia map of 1872 located them S. of Stuart lake, between 54° and 55° N. Dawson (Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., 192B, 1889) states that they, together with the Sekani, inhabit the headwaters of Skeena, Fraser, and Peace rs. Morice (Proc. Can. Inst., 112, 1889) says that they are one of the three western Dené tribes and that their habitat borders that of the Tsilkotin on the S. and extends as far up as 56° N.

The Takulli were first visited by Mackenzie, who, in 1793, traversed their country on his way from L. Athabasca to the Pacific. In 1805 the first trading post was established among them. They are a semisedentary tribe, having fixed homes in regularly organized villages which they leave at regular seasons for purposes of hunting and fishing. They are the most numerous, important, and progressive of all the northern Athapascan tribes. They borrowed many customs from the coast Indians, as the Chimmesyan are in close communication with their northern and the Heiltsuk with their southern septa. The practice of wearing wooden labrets was obtained from the Chimmesyan, while from the coast tribes they adopted the custom of burning the dead. A widow was obliged to remain upon the funeral pyre of her husband till the flames reached her own body; she then collected the ashes of the dead, placed them in a basket, which she was obliged to carry with her during three years of servitude in the family of her deceased husband, at the end of which time a feast was held, when she was released from thralldom and permitted to remarry if she desired. From this custom the tribe came to be called Carriers. No fewer than 8 kinds of snares were employed by the Takulli, and Morice states (Trans. Can. Inst., 137, 1893) that copper and iron implements and ornaments were used by them before the advent of the whites, but that they wrought copper only. He classes them as Upper and Lower Carriers and Babines, although such a distinction is not recognized by the tribe itself. They have a society composed of hereditary "noblemen" or landowners, and a lower class who hunt with or for these; but slavery, as it exists among the neighboring Athapaskan tribes, is not practised by them. They have no head chiefs and are exogamous, all title and property rights descending through the mother. Each band or clan has a well-defined hunting ground, which is seldom encroached on by others of the tribe. They are not so numerous now as formerly, a number of their villages having become extinct. An independent band has settled at Ft McLeod, in the Sekani country. Drake (Bk. Inds., viii, 1848) said that in 1820 they numbered 100; Anderson (Hist. Mag., vii, 73, 1863) estimated the population in 1835 as 5,000, and in 1839 as 2,625, of which number 897 were men, 688 women, 578 sons, and 462 daughters. Morice (Proc. Can. Inst., 112, 1889) gave the population as 1,600. The number reported in 1902 was 1,551, and 1,614 in 1909. Hale (Ethnol. and Philol., 201, 1846) and McDonald (Brit. Col., 126, 1862) divided them into 11 clans, as follows: Babine (Nataotin and Hwosotenne), Naskotin, Natliatin, Nikozliatin, Ntshaautin, Nulaaudin, Tatshiautin, Tautin, Thetliotin, Tsatsuotin (Tanotenne), and Tsilkotin. The Tsilkotin are a distinct group, as determined by Morice (Trans. Can. Inst., 24, 1893), who gives 9 septes of the Takulli: I, Southern Carriers: 1, Ltautenne (Tautin); 2, Nazkutenne (Naskotin); 3, Tanotenne; 4, Nutcatenna (Ntshaautin); 5, Natlotenne (Natliatin). II, Northern Carriers: 6, Nakraztitenne (Nikozliatin); 7, Tlaztenne (Tatshiautin). III, Babines: 8, Nitutinni (Nataotin); 9, Hwotsotenne. Dawson (Rep. Progr. Geol. Surv., 30B, 1880) makes the Kustsheotin, whose village is Kezche, distinct from the Tatshiautin, the Tatshikotin from the Nulaaudin, and the Stelatin of Stella village from the Natliatin.

Takusalgi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 155, 1884. Tāk'-ko.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 161, 1878.

Takutine. A Nahane tribe living on Teslin r. and lake and upper Takur r., Brit. Col., speaking the same dialect as the Tahltan. Their hunting grounds include the basin of Big Salmon r., extending n. to the Pelly r. and e. to upper Liard r. Dall (Proc. A. A. A. S., 19, 1885) as well as Dawson called them a part of the Tahltan. Dawson (Geol. Surv. Can., 201B, 1889) classes them as distinct from a tribe of similar name in the upper Pelly valley, but they are probably the same, and so also are probably the Nehane of Chilkat r., living on a stream that falls into Lewes r. near L. Labarge. Dall describes the latter as bold and enterprising, great traders, and of great intelligence, while the Takutine, he said (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 33, 1877), are few in number and little known.

Chilkaht-tena.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 33, 1877. Nehaunees of the Chilkaht River.—Ibid. Tāh'-ko-tin'-neh.—Ibid. Ta-koos-oo-ti-na.—Dawson in Rep. Geol. Surv. Can. 1887-88, 200B, 1889. Taku.—Ibid., 193B.

Takuyumam (Ta-ku-yu'-mam). A Chumashan village formerly on the site of Newhall, Los Angeles co., Cal., not far from the Ventura co. line.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Takwanedi (Tā'k'uane'di, 'wintry people'). A division of the Tlingit at Klawak, Alaska, belonging to the Raven phratry. (J. R. S.)

Takwashnaw. Given as a Lower Cherokee town on Mouzon's map of 1771 (Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 143, 1887). Not identified.

Takya. The Frog or Toad clan of Zuñi pueblo, N. Mex.

Tāk'yaiuna-kwe.—Cushing in 13th Rep. B. A. E., 368, 1896 (kwe = 'people'). Tāk'ya-kwe.—Ibid.

Tala ('palmetto town'). One of the Choctaw Six-towns which controlled land, chiefly in Newton co., Miss., lying between Tarlow and Bogue Felamma crs. from the watershed connecting the headwaters of these two streams down to the confluence of each with Pottokchito cr. It was a thickly settled community, nearly all of the people of which went W. in the migration of 1832.—Halbert in Pub. Ala. Hist. Soc., Misc. Coll., I, 381, 1901. Talla.—West Florida map, ca. 1775. Tallatown.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 109, 1884.

Tala (tá'la, 'wolf'). A Yuchi clan. Daká.—Speck, Yuchi Inds., 70, 1909. Ta'la tabá.—Gatschet, Uchee MS., B. A. E., 1885 (= 'wolfgens').

Taladega (Talatigi, from itálua 'town,' atigi 'at the end'). A former Upper Creek town E. of Coosa r., on the site of the present town of the same name, in N. E. Talladega co., Ala. A battle was fought there Nov. 7, 1813. (A. S. G.)

Taladega.—Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. 4, 108, 1848. Talatigi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 144, 1884. Talladega.—Flint, Ind. Wars, 187, 1833. Talledega.—Hawkins (1814) in Am. State Pap., Ind. Aff., I, 845, 1832.

Taladega. A town of the Creek Nation, on Canadian r., S. W. of Hilabi, Okla.

Taladega.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., II, 186, 1888. Taladigi.—Ibid.

Talahassee ('old town,' from tálua 'town,' hasi 'old.'—Gatschet). A former Seminole town situated on what in 1775 was the road from the ford of Ocklocknee r. to Mikasuki town, Fla.; now the site of Tallahassee, the capital. According to Bartram (Trav., 225, 1792) it consisted of about 30 houses at that time.

Sim-e-no-le-tal-lau-haf-see.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 25, 1848 (f=s). Spring Gardens.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826. Tahalasochte.—Bartram, Trav., I, map, 1799. Talahasochte.—Ibid., 224, ed. 1792. Tallahassa.—H. R. Ex. Talahassudshi ('little Talasse'). A town of the Creek Nation on the N. bank of Canadian r. about 18 m. W. of Eufaula, Okla. See Talasse.

Talahassudshi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., II, 186, 1888.

Tellowe.—Bartram, Trav., 371, 1792. Tetohe.—Mouzon's map cited by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 143, 1887 (possibly identical).

Talak (Ta'lak). A former Nishinam village in the valley of Bear r., which is the next stream N. of Sacramento, Cal. Talac.—Powers in Overland Mo., XII, 22, 1874. Ta'lak.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 316, 1877.

Talakhacha. A former Seminole town on the W. side of C. Florida, on the Florida coast. Tullishago was chief in 1823.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Talal. A former village of the Willoughby, 6 m. S. of Claquato, Lewis co., Wash. Ohis-le-ráh.—Gibbs, MS., B. A. E. (Cowlitz name). Ford's Prairie.—Ibid. Tahtl-shin.—Ibid. (own name). Tálal.—Ibid. (Chehalis name). Taa-whah-sen.—Ibid.

Talaniyi ('sumac place,' from taláni 'red sumac'). A Cherokee settlement in upper Georgia about the period of the removal of the tribe to the W. in 1839; known to the whites as "Shoemake." Shoomeek.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887.

Talapoosa. A comprehensive name for the Creek towns and tribes formerly on Tallapoosa r., Ala. They belonged to the Upper Creek division, forming its eastern group. There were 13 towns of the Talapoosa in 1715, with 2,343 inhabitants. The most important were Atasi, Fusihatchi, Hillabi, Huhliwahli, Imukfa, Kitchopataki, Kulumi, Talasse, and Tukabatchi. (A. S. G.)

Talabouches.—Robin, Voy. à la Louisiane, II, 54, 1807. Talabouchi.—De l'Isle, map (1700) in Winsor Hist. Amer., II, 295, 1886. Talapenches.—French, Hist. Col. Talasse. A former Upper Creek town on the E. bank of Coosa r., 1 m. below the falls, in Elmore co., Ala. It was generally known to white settlers and traders as Little Talasse, and has been identified as the Italisi, Tali, Talise, and Talisee of the chroniclers of the De Soto expedition. According to Benjamin Hawkins (Sketch, 40, 1848) the place mustered 40 gun-men in 1799. It is unlikely that this is the Tali mentioned by Coxe (Carolana, 14, 1741) as on an island in Tennessee r. See Odshiapofa. (A. S. G.)

Taliepatana (perhaps Choctaw: 'cleft in the rock.'—Halbert). A former town in W. Alabama or E. Mississippi, between

Taliepatana.—Halbert in Trans. Ala. Hist. Soc., III, 70, 1899. Taliepatava.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 160, 1850.

Talimuchasi ('new town'). A former settlement, probably of the Upper Creeks, on Coosa r., in Talladega or Coosa co., Ala. According to Ranjel (Oviedo, Hist. Gen., I, lib. XVII, 565, 1851) De Soto reached this town the same day he left Coça (Kusa) in 1540. There is a Creek town of the same name in Oklahoma.

Talimachusy.—Oviedo misquoted by Bourne, Narr. De Soto, II, 113, 1904. Talimuchusy.—Oviedo, op. cit. Tallimuchase.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 153, 1850. Talmotchasi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., II, 186, 1888 (in Oklahoma).

Talimuchasi. A former Upper Creek town and subordinate settlement of Okfuskee, on the W. side of Tallapoosa r., 4 m. above Niuyaka and 35 or 40 m. above Tukabatchi, probably in Randolph co., Ala. Prior to 1797 it was known as Tukabatchi Tallahassee ('Tukabatchi old town'); from or shortly after that year it was known as Talimuchasi, or Newtown. In 1832 it contained 48 heads of families. Cf. Telmocresses.

Talking Rock (trans. of Cherokee Nāñ-yū'-gūñwani'skī, 'rock that talks'). A former Cherokee settlement or settlements on Talking Rock cr., an affluent of Coosawatee r., N. Ga. The town-house was situated about a mile above the present Talking Rock station on the w. side of the railroad. The name refers, according to one informant, to an echo rock somewhere on the stream below the present railroad station.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 417, 1900.

"Talks and Thoughts." See Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute.

Tallapoolina. A Chumashan village formerly at Rancho Viejo, Ventura co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860.

Tall Bull (Hotā-qu-ihooīs). A name hereditary among the Cheyenne and borne at different periods by several distinguished men, of whom the most noted was a prominent leader of the hostile Dog Soldier band, the principals in the outbreak of 1868-69. After nearly a year of savage raiding along the Kansas border, they were completely routed by Gen. E. A. Carr, with part of the Fifth cavalry and a detachment of Pawnee scouts, on July 11, 1869, at Summit Springs cr., N. E. Colorado, Tall Bull being among the slain. See Cheyenne. (J. M.)

Tallulah (strictly Tālulū'). The name of two former Cherokee settlements, one, ancient, situated on the upper part of Tallulah r., in Rabun co., Ga.; the other on Tallulah cr. of Cheowa r., in Graham co., N. C. The word is of uncertain etymology. In documents from the Lower dialect it is spelled with an r. (J. M.)

Taluamikagi. The towns controlled by the peace or white clans, forming one of the two great divisions of the Creek settlements. They were governed by civil officers only, and according to earlier authors were considered as places of refuge for criminals. The following are said to have been the peace towns: Hitchiti, Oakfuski (and 7 branch villages), Kasihta, Abihka, Abikudshi, Talasse, Okchayi, Lutchapoga, Tuskegee, Assilanapi, and Wewoka. Cf. Kipaya. (A. S. G.)

E-tall-wau.—Hawkins (1779), Sketch, 52, 1842. White towns.—Ibid.

Taluathlako ('large town'). A town of the Creek Nation, on the North Fork, at the mouth of Alabama cr., Okla.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., II, 186, 1888.

Tam. The Antelope clan of the Tigua pueblo of Isleta, N. Mex.

T'am-t'ainin.—Lummis quoted by Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 318, 1896 (t'ainin = 'people').

Tama. The native name of one of the administrative functionaries of the Hasi-nai. The word was adopted by the Spaniards of Texas and applied quite generally to similar officers among other Indians. The tamas were messengers, policemen, and overseers; they prepared materials for ceremonies, ran from house to house calling people together for festivals and meetings, notified them when they must help with communal labor, and stood by to see that each did his part. Speaking of this last function, Jesus María says of them: "These are the ones who hasten affairs; the lazy they whip on the legs with rods" (Jesus María, Relación, MS., 1691; Espinosa, Crónica Apostólica, 420, 421, 431, 1746). (H. E. B.)

Tama. See Taimah.

Tamaha ('rising moose'). A noted chief of the Mdewakanton Sioux, who lived in the region of Blue Earth and Mille Lacs in Minnesota. He was born on the site of Winona, Minn., about 1775, and in the early part and middle of the last century was one of the chief men of his tribe. He seems to have maintained throughout his long life an excellent reputation for honesty. In childhood, while at play, he sustained the loss of an eye, on which account the French nicknamed him "Le Borgne," or "One Eye," and the English "the One-Eyed Sioux." In 1806-07 he met and formed a great admiration for Lieut. Z. M. Pike, and so constantly did he sing the praises of his white friend that the Indians, with a sense of humor worthy a modern punster, changed the pronunciation of the last syllable of his name from haw to hay, which made the name signify "pike," the fish. Because of his attachment for Pike, he is said to have been the only Sioux Indian, with one exception, whose sympathies were with the Americans, and who did active service for them during the War of 1812. In this crisis, when Joseph Renville and the old Little Crow led their Sioux followers against the United States forces, Tahama refused to join them. At this period he made his way to St Louis, and at the solicitation of General Clarke, then Indian Commissioner, he entered the service of the United States as a scout and messenger. He returned in 1814 with Manuel Lisa, when the latter was on his way to confer with the Missouri River Indians, and, parting with him at the mouth of James r., carried dispatches to the Americans at Prairie du Chien, Wis. Through many privations and discouragements he remained loyal to the United States and faithfully performed the duties assigned him. While on one of his trips to Prairie du Chien, Tamaha was imprisoned by Col. Robert Dickson, an Indian trader, and at that time an officer in the service of the British, who, under threat of death, attempted to compel him to divulge information relative to the Americans; but Tamaha would not yield. After a term of imprisonment he was released and again visited St Louis in 1816. On this visit he was present at the council held by General Clarke with the forty-six chiefs from the upper Missouri, who had returned with Manuel Lisa. On this occasion General Clarke presented him with a medal of honor and a captain's uniform, and commissioned him chief of the Sioux nation. He is said to have been a man of fine physique and much natural dignity, and an orator of unusual ability. One of his peculiarities was to wear always a stove-pipe hat. Until his death, at Wabasha, Minn., in April, 1860, at the age of 85, he was much respected, not only by the whites but by his own people. His name is also written Tahama, Tahamie, Tamamahaw. By the French he was called Original Levé, the translation of his native designation. (D. R. C. T.)

Tamakwapi ('beaver man'). A clan, class, or division, probably of the Delawares, mentioned in the Walam Olum in contradistinction to southerners, wolfmen, hunters, priests, and others.—Brinton, Lenape Leg., 187, 1885.

Beaver-men.—Squier in Beach, Ind. Miscel., 29, 1877. Tamakwapis.—Ibid.

Tamal. A Moquelumnan or Miwok term, signifying 'bay,' used by the division of that family which occupied the coast region immediately n. of San Francisco bay and comprising the greater part of Marin co., Cal. It was applied by them to any bay, but particularly to the largest bay with which they were familiar, what is now known as Tomales bay. Tomales is simply a rendition of the original Indian term in a modified Spanish orthography. The name survives also in Tomales point and the town of Tomales. Mt Tamalpais is an aboriginal name and comes from this term, tamal 'bay', and pais 'mountain'. The name Tamal and various modifications of it were applied to certain of the neophytes at San Rafael and Sonoma missions. Most of these, it is supposed, came from the vicinity of Tomales bay, or at least from w. of the missions and in the direction of that bay. (S. A. B.)

Tamal.—Chamisso in Kotzebue, Voy., III, 51, 1821.

Tamalenos.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Mar. 2, 1860.

Tamali (Tamá'li). The name of two places, and probably settlements there situated, in the Cherokee country. One was on Valley r., a few miles above Murphy, about the present Tomatola, in Cherokee co., N. C.; the other was on Little Tennessee r., about Tomotley ford, a few miles above Tellico r., in Monroe co., Tenn. The name can not be translated and may be of Creek origin, as that tribe had a town of the same name on lower Chattahoochee r. (J. M.)

Tamable.—Bartram, Travels, 372, 1792 (the second or Tennessee town). Tamá'li.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 534, 1900. Ta-mé-tah.—Adair, *Am. Tamanos. A term used to designate shamanistic power, and applied in descriptions of the customs of the tribes of Oregon, Washington, and British Columbia, or of the region in which the Chinook jargon was spoken. The word is derived from Chinook it'amā'noas, designating "beings endowed with supernatural power." The Indian word is not equivalent to terms expressing magic power, like wakanda of the Siouan tribes, orenda of the Iroquois, naualak of the Kwakiutl. In the Indian languages of this region, and particularly in Chinook, the term is not applied to designate the shaman, but in literary usage it has come to mean shamanistic acts and all the performances belonging to the secret societies of the n. Pacific coast. Witchcraft is often designated as "black tamanos," while the art of the shaman as a healer is sometimes designated as "white tamanos." In the latter part of the 19th century the word passed out of use among the Lower Chinook, because a person of a name similar to the word it'amā'noas died, and in accordance with their custom another word was substituted. (F. B.)

Tamaque ('beaver'). A famous Delaware chief, of the Unalachtigo tribe, commonly called The Beaver, or King Beaver. He was a brother of the no less famous Shingass, who was one of the most cruel and crafty foes of the settlers in w. Pennsylvania during the years of Indian hostility. The chief place of residence of "King Beaver" was at the mouth of Beaver r., at the place called Shingis Town, and later called "The Beaver's Town" (see Sawcunk, Tuscarawas). He also had a place of residence at Kuskuski, and spent part of his time at Kittanning. When the English took possession of Ft Duquesne he moved to Ohio, where his village, near the junction of the Tuscarawas and Big Sandy, was called "The Beaver's Town." He was friendly to the English until after Braddock's defeat (1755), when he allied himself with the French. When Post made his journey in 1758 to the western Indians, "King Beaver," as he calls him, was the chief speaker in all the councils held at Kuskuski. On Post's second mission to the Ohio, in advance of Forbes' expedition (Nov. 1758), he carried letters addressed by General Forbes to "Brethren, Kings Beaver and Shingass" (Thwaites, Early West. Trav., I, 267, 1904). He at that time spoke of the desire of the Indians to resume their alliance with the English. He was present at the council held at Ft Pitt in the fall of 1759 by Gen. Stanwix, and also at that held by Gen. Moncton in Aug. 1760 (Rupp, Hist. West. Pa., app., 139, 1846). In 1762 Beaver and Shingass sent word to the Governor of Pennsylvania that it was their desire to remain friendly with the English, and in the same year he promised to deliver all the white prisoners with the Indians at Ft Pitt. Col. Burd and Josiah Davenport were appointed commissioners to receive the new location. Before June 18 Bustillo had dug there an acequia for the mission, and the padre from Espíritu Santo had established himself in the new post, planted crops, and begun to attract the Indians. The presidio had not yet been transferred).

The Tamique are quite probably distinct from the Tacame, though it has been surmised that they were identical. The two were given in 1733 as separate tribes by Governor Almazán, who was in a position to know. Nevertheless, according to Bonilla only the Tancame (Tacame) were at Espíritu Santo de Zuñiga mission in 1727, a time when the Tamique are supposed to have been there. This suggests the identity of the two tribes. The Tamique and Xaraname spoke a language different from that of the Karankawan tribes living between themselves and the coast, a fact that was used as an argument for founding mission Nuestra Señora del Rosario as a separate establishment for the latter tribes in 1754 (see Bolton in Tex. Hist. Asso. Quar., x, 1907).

In 1749 Espíritu Santo de Zuñiga mission was again removed, this time to San Antonio r., opposite modern Goliad, the Tamique and the Xaraname going with it. The Xaraname subsequently gave much trouble by deserting, but the Tamique do not figure in the accounts of these difficulties. It can not be because they had become extinct, for a report made by the missionary in 1794 states that they were still at the mission to the number of 25 (Fr. José de Aguilar, quoted in Portillo, Apuntes para la Hist. Antigua de Coahuila y Texas, 308, 1880). The building at Goliad, now popularly designated as "Aranama College," is evidently one of the presidial buildings, and not a part of the mission, as this was across the river. (H. E. B.)

Tamkan. A tribe mentioned by Langsdorff (Voy., II, 163, 1814) as residing inland from the coast of California and as being at enmity with the coast tribes. It possibly belonged to the Costanoan family.

Tammahaw. See Tamaha.

Tammany (from Tamanend, 'the affable.' — Heckewelder). The common form of the name of a noted ancient Delaware chief, written also Tamanee, Tamanen, Tamanend, Tamany, Tamened, Taminy, Temane. In the form of Tamanen his name appears as one of the signers of a deed to William Penn in 1683 for lands not far n. from Philadelphia, within the present Bucks co., Pa.

The missionary Heckewelder, writing in 1817, describes him as the greatest and best chief known to Delaware tribal tradition. "The name of Tamanend is held in the highest veneration among the Indians. Of all the chiefs and great men which the Lenape nation ever had, he stands foremost on the list. But although many fabulous stories are circulated about him among the whites, but little of his real history is known. . . . All we know, therefore, of Tamanend is that he was an ancient Delaware chief, who never had his equal. He was in the highest degree endowed with wisdom, virtue, prudence, charity, affability, meekness, hospitality, in short with every good and noble qualification that a human being may possess. He was supposed to have had an intercourse with the great and good Spirit, for he was a stranger to everything that was bad. . . . The fame of this great man extended even among the whites, who fabricated numerous legends respecting him, which I never heard, however, from the mouth of an Indian, and therefore believe to be fabulous. In the Revolutionary war his enthusiastic admirers dubbed him a saint, and he was established under the name of St. Tammany, the Patron Saint of America. His name was inserted in some calendars, and his festival celebrated on the first day of May in every year." Heckewelder goes on to describe the celebration, which was conducted on Indian lines, including the smoking of the calumet, and Indian dances in the open air, and says that similar "Tammany societies" were afterward organized in other cities. He states also that when Col. George Morgan, of Princeton, N. J., was sent by Congress about the year 1776 upon a special mission to the western tribes, the Delawares conferred upon him the name of Tamanend in remembrance of the ancient chief and as the greatest mark of respect that they could pay to Morgan.

Haines, however (Am. Inds., 658, 1888), in his chapter on the Order of Red Men, quotes a contemporary document from which it appears that the Philadelphia society, which was probably the first bearing the name, and is claimed as the original of the Red Men secret order, was organized May 1, 1772, under the title of "Sons of King Tammany," with strongly Loyalist tendency. It is probable that the "Saint Tammany" society was a later organization of Revolutionary sympathizers opposed to the kingly idea. Saint Tammany parish, La., preserves the memory. The practice of organizing American political and military societies on an Indian basis dates back to the French and Indian war, and was especially in favor among the soldiers of the Revolutionary army, most of whom were frontiersmen more or less familiar with Indian life and custom. Of several such societies organized about the Revolutionary period the only ones still existing are the secret Improved Order of Red Men (q. v.) and the famous Tammany Society, originally established as a patriotic and charitable organization, but now for many years best known as the dominating factor in the Democratic politics of New York city. It was founded in 1786 by William Mooney, a Revolutionary veteran and former leader of the "Sons of Liberty," and regularly organized with a constitution in 1789 (most of the original members being Revolutionary soldiers), for the purpose of guarding "the independence, the popular liberty, and the federal union of the country," in opposition to the efforts of the aristocratic element, as represented by Hamilton and the Federalists, to make the new government practically a monarchy, with life tenure for President and Senate and a restricted property suffrage. Its two main purposes were declared to be (1) the perpetuity of republican institutions, and (2) the care of Revolutionary soldiers, their widows and orphans, "and of others who might be proper objects of charity." The society—occasionally at first known as the Columbian Order—took an Indian title and formulated for itself a ritual based upon supposedly Indian custom. Thus, the name chosen was that of the traditional Delaware chief; the meeting place was called the "wigwam"; there were 13 "tribes" or branches corresponding to the 13 original states, the New York parent organization being the "Eagle Tribe," New Hampshire the "Otter Tribe," Delaware the "Tiger Tribe," whence the famous "Tammany tiger," etc. The principal officer of each tribe was styled the "sachem," and the head of the whole organization was designated the kitchi okemaw, or grand sachem, which office was held by Mooney himself for more than 20 years. Subordinate officers also were designated by other Indian titles, records were kept according to the Indian system by moons and seasons, and at the regular meetings the members attended in semi-Indian costume.

For the first 30 years of its existence, until the close of the War of 1812, nearly the whole effort of the society was directed to securing and broadening the foundations of the young republic, and it is possible that without Tammany's constant vigilance the National Government could not have survived the open and secret attacks of powerful foes both within and without. In 1790 it was chiefly instrumental in the negotiation of a treaty with the Creek Indians, by which the peace of the southern border was secured.

About the same time it took steps for the establishment of an Indian museum, the germ of the New York Historical Society. In 1808 it collected and gave suitable burial to the bones of the Revolutionary victims of the prison ships at Wallabout bay. In the War of 1812 it furnished three generals to the United States army, and 1,200 men from its own membership for the construction of defenses about New York city. In 1817 it brought back from Canada and interred with fitting ceremony the body of Gen. Richard Montgomery, killed at the siege of Quebec. In 1826, after years of effort, it secured full manhood suffrage in the state of New York, and in 1831 it procured the abolition of imprisonment for debt in New York city. In 1861 it raised from its membership, equipped, and sent to the front, under its own Grand Sachem as colonel, the 42d N. Y. Infantry regiment. The original New York organization still survives, the other branches having long passed out of existence, but of late years it has devoted its energies chiefly to the control of local politics. Its central executive body is known as Tammany Hall. Theoretically the "Society" and the "Hall" are two distinct bodies, the one representing the social and fraternal functions, the other the political "machine"; but as their officership is largely identical, their meetings held in the same "wigwam," and the names similar, the distinction is of minor importance. * Tampa. A Calusa village on the s. w. coast of Florida, about 1570, according to Fontaneda (Memoir ca. 1575, Smith trans., 19, 1854). He gives it first place in his list of more than 20 Calusa villages and describes it as a large town.

Tamuleko (from taman, or tamalin, 'north'). A general term, which may be translated "northerners," applied by the Miwok of the southern Sierra Nevada region of California to all the people living to the N. of themselves. The name was applied not only by the Miwok as a whole to a people of another stock living to the N., but the people of any Miwok village employed it in referring to the people of the same stock living in the region perhaps but a few miles N. of themselves. Similarly the people living in the other cardinal directions were called, respectively, Hisotoko, 'eastern-

Tangipahoa (from ta'ndshi, 'maize'; apa, 'stalk,' 'cob'; ara, 'to gather': 'those who gather maize stalks or cobs.'—Wright. Pénicaut explains the river name Tandgepao erroneously as 'white wheat or corn'). An extinct tribe, supposed to be Muskhogean, formerly living on the lower Mississippi and on Tangipahoa r., which flows s. into L. Pontchartrain, s. E. La. Tonti mentions this people as residing, in 1682, on the Mississippi, 12 leagues from the Quinipissa village; but, according to Iberville (Margry, Déc., IV, 168, 1880), the Bayougoula informed him that the Tangipahoa had never lived on the Mississippi; nevertheless both statements agree in making their town one of the 7 villages of the Acolapissa. When La Salle reached their village he found that it had recently been burned, and saw dead bodies lying on one another. According to the information given Iberville by the Bayougoula, the village had been destroyed by the Huma. Nothing definite is known of the language and affinities of the tribe, but their apparent relations with the Acolapissa indicate Muskhogean affinity. Their village was one of those said to belong to the Acolapissa.

Tano (from Taháno, the Tigua form of Thán-u-ge, the Tano name for themselves). A former group of Pueblo tribes of New Mexico, whose name has been adopted for the family designation (see Tanoan Family). In prehistoric times, according to Bandelier, the Tano formed the southern group of the Tewa, the separation of the two occurring at the ancient village of Tejeuingge Ouiping. In the early historical period the Tano habitat was southward from Santa Fé to the Galisteo basin, a distance of about 20 m.

Coronado passed through the southern part of their territory in 1541, Castañeda describing it as lying between the Quirix (Queres) province and Cicuye (Pecos), and as being almost depopulated on account of depredations by the Teya, a warlike tribe of the plains, 16 years previously. Only 3 pueblos are mentioned by Castañeda as along their route—Ximena (Galisteo), a small, strong village; the Pueblo de los Silos, large, but almost deserted; and another farther eastward, abandoned and in ruins. The last mentioned was probably the one called Coquite by Mota Padilla. In addition to these, however, there were 7 other Tano pueblos in the "snowy mts.," toward Santa Fé.

The Tano were next visited by Espejo, who went eastwardly from the country of the Tigua, in the vicinity of the present Bernalillo, to the province of the Maguas or Magrias (probably a misprint of Tagnos, a form of the Tigua name), in a pine country without running streams, on the borders of the buffalo plains, where he heard news of the death there of Fray Juan de Santa María two years before. As the seat of this friar's missionary labors was Pecos, that pueblo was evidently included by Espejo in his Maguas province, to which he attributed the grossly exaggerated population of 40,000, in 11 pueblos. The accounts of Espejo's journey are unsatisfactory as to directions and distances traveled, and some of the reputed narratives of his expedition are unauthentic. Bandelier regards as the Tano country Espejo's province of Hubates, with 5 pueblos, which he visited, after returning from a western tour, by traveling 12 leagues eastward from the Queres on the Rio Grande. Thence in a day's journey Espejo found the "Tamos" in three large villages, one of which was Pecos. This variance in names is doubtless due to guides speaking different languages. If the number of (Tano) villages given by Castañeda in 1540 is correctly given as 10, and if the number of pueblos mentioned by Espejo in 1583 as contained in his provinces of Hubates and Tamos (7, excluding Pecos) is also correct, then it would seem that the hostility of the Teyas spoken of by Castañeda in 1540 had continued in the interim, and that the Tano had been compelled to abandon three of their settlements. This, however, could not have been the case if the 10 villages (excluding Pecos) in Espejo's province of Maguas is rightly given, as the number agrees with that of Castañeda 40 years before.

In 1630 Benavides estimated the population of the then existing 5 Tano towns at 4,000, all of whom had been baptized. The tribe was almost entirely broken up by the Pueblo revolts of 1680-96, the Indians removing mainly to the Hopi of Arizona after 1694 and the last tribal remnant in New Mexico dying from smallpox early in the 19th century (Bandelier in Ritch, N. Mex., 201). The Tano language is now spoken only by a few natives settled in the Tewa, Tigua, and Queres pueblos along the Rio Grande, particularly at Santo Domingo.

Following is a list of Tano pueblos so far as known: Ciénega, Dyapige, Galisteo, Guika, Kayepu, Kipana, Kuakaa, Ojana, Paako, Pueblo Blanco, Pueblo Colorado, Pueblo de los Silos, Pueblo Largo, Pueblo Quemado (?), Puerto (?), San Cristóbal, San Lázaro, San Marcos, Sempoapi, Shé, Tuerto, Tungge, Tzemantuo, Tzenatay, Uapige.

Tanoan Family. A linguistic family consisting of the Tewa, Tano, Tigua, Jemez, and Piro groups of Pueblo Indians, who dwell or dwelt in various substantial villages on and near the Rio Grande in New Mexico. Of the groups mentioned the Tano and the Piro are extinct as tribes, and the Jemez includes the remnant of the former inhabitants of Pecos. Gatschet was of the belief that the Tanoan family is a remote branch of the Shoshonean, but thus far the relationship has not been definitively shown. For information regarding the various divisions, see under their respective names. Consult Powell in 7th Rep. B. A. E., 121, 1891; Harrington in Am. Anthr., XI, no. 4, 1909.

Tanom. A branch of the Yuki which lived on the E. side of Ecl r., about W. of Round valley, central Cal. They were neighbors of the Athapaskan Wailaki, and in their most important ceremony resembled these rather than the other Yuki. (A. L. K.)

Tanotenne ('people a short distance to the north'). A band of the Takulli, apparently officially known as the Ft George band, under Babine and Upper Skeena agency, at the junction of Stuart and Fraser rs., Brit. Col., numbering 130 in 1892, 124 in 1909, in the village of Leitli. Their other village, Chinlak, was destroyed by the Tsilkotin. They have extensive hunting grounds E. of Fraser r. as far as the Rocky and Caribou mts.

Aunghim.—Lennard, Brit. Col., 213, 1862. Tanotenne.—Morice, letter, B. A. E., 1890 ('people a short distance to the north'). Tsatsnótin.—Hale, Ethnol. and Philol., 202, 1846. Tsatsuotin.—McDonald, Brit. Col., 126, 1862.

Tanpacuazes. A tribe named in 1780 by Cabello, governor of Texas, as one of those living on the coast between the Rio Grande and the Nueces. It was perhaps one of the Coahuiltecan tribes of that region known by some other name (Cabello, Rep. on Coast Tribes, May 28, 1780, MS. in Bexar Archives, cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1908).

Tanques (Span. Los Tanques, 'the tanks,' 'water-holes,' 'pools'). A ruined pueblo, probably of the Tigua, on the Rio Grande, near Albuquerque, N. Mex.—Loew (1875) in Wheeler Surv. Rep., VII, 338, 1879.

Tantucquask. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608 on Rappahannock r., in Richmond co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Tanunak. A Nunivagmiut Eskimo village and Jesuit mission near C. Vancouver, Nelson id., Alaska. Pop. 8 in 1880, 48 in 1890.

Dununuk.—11th Census, Alaska, 110, 1893. Tanunak.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 54, 1880.—Tununuk.—Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1899.

ja^s wa-k'a^s wa-xá-xe.—Dorsey, Osage MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1883.

Cawva-Shinka.—De Smet, W. Miss., 365, 1856 ('little town'). Little Town.—Ibid. Ta^swa^s oin^sqa.—Dorsey, Osage MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1883.

Tanxnitania (from Powhatan tanx, 'little'). A tribe of the Manahoac confederacy, living in 1608 in Fauquier co., Va., on the N. side of upper Rappahannock r.

Tanxnitania.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, 1819.

nanians.—Boudinot, Star in the West, 129, 1816.

Tauxitanians.—Jefferson, Notes, 179, 1801. Taux-

Tauxuntania.—Ibid.

Tanyi. The Calabash clans of the Keresan pueblos of Acoma, Sia, San Felipe, and Cochiti, N. Mex. That of Acoma forms a phratry with the Showwiti (Parrot) and Hapanyi (Oak) clans. The dialectal variations in pronunciation of the name are: Acoma, Tányi-hánoq^{ch}; Sia and San Felipe, Tányi-háno; Cochiti, Tányi-hánuch (Hodge in Am. Anthr., ix, 349, 1896). According to Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 301, 1890) the Calabash clan, since the beginning of the 19th century, seems to represent what might be called the progressive element. Cf. Shuuvimi.

Táño.—Stevenson in 11th Rep. B. A. E., 19, 1894 (Sia form). Tanyi hanutsh.—Bandelier, Delight Makers, 28, 1890.

Tao. The Beaver gens of the Caddo.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1093, 1896.

Taoapa. A band of Mdewakanton Sioux formerly living on Minnesota r. in the present Scott co., Minn., and hunting between it and the Mississippi. Their village, generally known as Shakopee's Village, or Little Six's Village, from the chief of the band, was on the left bank of the river and the cemetery on the opposite side in 1835. See Shakopee.

Taol-naas-hadai (Taol na'as rá'da-i, 'Rainbow-house people'). A subdivision of the Ao-keawai, a Haida family belonging to the Raven clan; named from a house. They belonged to the Alaskan group, or Kaigani.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 272, 1905.

Taos (Span. pl. adaptation of Tówh, its Tewa name). A Tigua pueblo consisting of two house groups, known as North town (Hlauuma) and South town (Hlaukwima), on both sides of Taos r., an E. tributary of the Rio Grande, in Taos co., N. Mex., 52 m. N. E. of Santa Fé. The native name of the pueblo is Tüatá; of the people, Tāfinamu. The pueblo is also called Yahlahaimubahutulba, 'Red-willow place.' It was first visited in 1540 by Hernando de Alvarado, and in 1541 by Francisco de Barrionuevo, both of Coronado's army, who called it Braba (seemingly a miscopying of Tuata), Yuraba, and Uraba (perhaps intended for the Pecos form Yulata), as well as Valladolid, the last, no doubt, on account of some fancied resemblance to the Spanish city of that name. Taos did not then stand in the spot it occupies to-day, but a few hundred yards to the N. E., and on both sides of the stream as now. One of the narratives of Coronado's expedition (Rel. del Suceso, 14th Rep. B. A. E., 575, 1896) described the town, under the name Yuraba, as having 18 divisions, each with "a situation as if for two ground plots; the houses are very close together, and have five or six stories, three of them with mud walls and two or three with thin wooden walls, which become smaller as they go up, and each one has its little balcony outside of the mud walls, one above the other, all around, of wood. In this village, as it is in the mountains, they do not raise cotton nor breed fowls [turkeys]; they wear the skins of deer and cows [buffalo] entirely. It is the most populous village of all that country; we estimated there were 15,000 persons in it." This estimate is certainly greatly exaggerated.

Taos was visited also in 1598 by Oñate, who applied to it its first saint name—San Miguel. It became the seat of the Spanish mission of San Gerónimo early in the 17th century, and in the middle of the century some families moved to the Jicarillas, at a place called El Quartejejo, in the present Scott co., Kans., but were subsequently brought back by Juan de Archuleta. In the Pueblo revolt of 1680–92 Taos took a conspicuous part. It was the central point from which Popé (q. v.) disseminated his doctrine of independence from Spanish authority, and was one of the first adherents to this cause. On Aug. 10, 1680, the day the outbreak began, the Taos warriors joined those of Picuris and the Tewa in the murder of their priests, as well as of all the colonists on which they could lay hands, and then proceeded to Santa Fe, where they formed part of the 3,000 Pueblos who laid siege to that town for 5 days, when Gov. Otermin succeeded in beating them off and in beginning his retreat to El Paso. All the Pueblos remained independent of the Spaniards until 1682, when Vargas reconquered the province. On his visiting Taos in October the Indians ran away, but were induced to return, professing friendship. After several conflicts with the Tewa in the following year (1693), Vargas again visited Taos on July 3, finding it abandoned, the Indians having taken refuge in a near-by canyon, after placing crosses on their property to command for it respect from the Spaniards. Attempts to negotiate with the natives proving a failure, Vargas sacked their village, taking much corn. Before the close of 1694 revolt of 1680 the population of Taos was about 2,000.

Owing to its situation on the northern frontier, Taos became an important trading rendezvous for the surrounding tribes, and its people also experienced several disastrous conflicts with the Ute, and in 1766 with the Comanche. To these hostilities was doubtless partly due the reduction of the once comparatively large population to 515 in 1910. See Pueblos.

In 1847 occurred what is known as the Taos rebellion. Instigated by Mexicans, whose ill feeling for the Americans had been aroused by the Mexican war, the Taos warriors, on Jan. 17, attacked and cruelly killed Gov. Charles Bent and other residents of the near-by Mexican settlement of Fernandez de Taos, and, joined by Mexicans, murdered all but one of nine Americans at Turley's mill, 12 peace again reigned, many of the pueblos were rebuilt, and new missionaries assigned. But it was not long ere the Pueblos again became restless; on June 4, 1696, another uprising of the northern pueblos, including Taos, took place, in which 5 missionaries and 21 other Spaniards were murdered, the Indians again abandoning their villages, seeking protection in mountain strongholds. In September Vargas attacked the Taos in their fortified canyon, and after a siege they were forced to surrender in the following month. At the beginning of the

m. above. News of the massacre reaching Santa Fe, troops were hastened to the place, which they reached Feb. 3, after several skirmishes on the way. The Indians and Mexicans were fortified in the massive adobe church, which was cannonaded at close range and its walls attacked with axes until its occupants were forced to flee to the near-by pueblo and thence toward the mountains. During the fight 150 of the insurgents were killed, about a third of this number in their attempt to escape from the pueblo. Fifteen others were afterward executed, and one was shot in attempting to escape. The loss of the Americans was 7 killed outright and 45 wounded, some of the latter, including Capt. Burgwin, fatally. Since that time the Taos people were entirely peaceable until May 1910, when a threatened uprising, which had its origin in land encroachment by whites, was speedily quelled on the appearance of Territorial troops.

Members of this tribe have probably intermarried extensively with the Ute, some of whose customs they have borrowed. Unlike the other Pueblos (q. v.), the men wear their hair in two long plaits hanging at the sides, and high leggings of deerskin. Their lands are well watered, and their livelihood is gained chiefly by agriculture and by hunting in the adjacent timbered mountains.

Of the mythology of the tribe little has as yet been recorded. The people assert that when their ancestors first came together they spoke a number of languages, but that the tongue of the Feather (Pfia) clan finally prevailed, and this is the language of the tribe to-day.

The following clans have been recorded by Mrs M. C. Stevenson, those with an asterisk being extinct: Tochohimafia (Golden Warbler), Talohlafia (Parrot [Macaw?]), Chiu (Eagle), Toltu (Sun), Ter-taitatana (Day people), Hahl (referring to a small shell), Fialohla (Abalone), Kangtong (Corn), Pachunona (White Shell Bead), Ba (Water), Kang (Corn-cob), Bachilto (Red Shell), Kahl (Wolf), Bahur (White Shell), Urhaina (Green Leaf), Chia (Stone Knife), Bahol (referring to a small animal), Turatu (Elk), Ba taina tongterlana ("Water people far talking"), Nam (Earth), *Towha (Coyote), *Kaki (Raven), *Pachotu (Rattlesnake), *Ton (Tree hole), *Poyo (Whippoorwill), *Chiyu (Rat), *Towhayu (Fighting Coyote), *Turwillana (referring to a cylindrical fossil marked in rings). In addition the following have been noted by Hodge: Pfia (Feather), Tu (House), Kua (Bear), Pianbotinu (White Mountain), and Ahluhl (of undetermined meaning). Pfistakwahlaonan, Kwahlaonan, and Hupfokwahlaonan are said to be divisions of a single clan. (V. W. H.)

Shkopa.—Robinson, letter to Dorsey, 1879. Split Livers.—Ibid. Tapioletca.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 220, 1897. Tapislecá.—Ibid.

Tapitsiama (Ta-pit-si'-a-ma). A pueblo of the Acoma people, which, according to tradition, was inhabited in prehistoric times during the southwestward migration of the tribe from the mythic Shipapu, in the indefinite north. It was the fifth pueblo traditionally occupied by this tribe, and its ruins may still be traced on a mesa 4 or 5 m. N. E. of their present pueblo. (F. W. H.)

Tapkachmiut.—Woolfe in 11th Census, Alaska, 130, 1893. Tapkhakgmüt.—Zagoskin, Descr. Russ. Poss. Am., I, 73, 1847. Tup-kug-ameuts.—Hooper, Cruise of Corwin, 26, 1880.

Ta-äp'-pu.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884. Tapo.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, July 24, 1863.

Taposa. A tribe formerly living on Yazoo r., Miss., of which little beyond the name is known. Iberville heard of them in 1699, when they were said to be between the Ofogoula and the Chakchiuma, on Yazoo r. Baudry des Lozières mentioned them in 1802, under the name Tapouchas, as settled in a village with Chakchiuma and Ibitoupa on upper Yazoo r., and in fact they were really the most northerly Yazoo tribe. They appear to have been one of the tribes confederated with the Chickasaw, and according to Le Page du Pratz spoke the same language. They occupied 25 cabins in 1730. (A. S. G.)

Tapoposcas.—Williams, Ter. Florida, 175, 1837. Tacuasas.—McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, III, 80, 1854. Tapguchas.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 7, 1776. Tapoosas.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., 537, 1878. Taposa.—Iberville (1699) in Margry, Déc., IV, 180, 1880. Tapouchas.—Jefferys, Fr. Dom. Am., 135, map, 1761. Tapousas.—Rafinesque in Marshall, Ky., I, introd., 30, 1824. Tapousos.—Boudinot, Star in the West, 129, 1816. Tapoussas.—Du Pratz, La., II, 226, 1758. Tapowsas.—Du Pratz misquoted by Schermerhorn (1812) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., II, 15, 1814.

Tapouaro. A division of the Illinois confederacy in 1681.—La Salle (1681) in Margry, Déc., II, 201, 1877.

Tappan (of uncertain meaning). A tribe or band of the Unami division of the Delawares, formerly occupying the w. bank of Hudson r. in Rockland co., N. Y., and Bergen co., N. J. They also claimed land on Staten id.

Tapanses.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, VI, 116, 1857 (from Tappansee, the bay in Hudson r. named by the Dutch from this tribe). Tappaan.—Deed of 1657 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XIV, 393, 1883. Tappaanes.—De Laet, Nov. Orb., 72, 1633. Tappaen.—De Vries (1639) quoted by Rutenber, Ind. Geog. Names, 118, 1906. Tappans.—Map of 1614 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., I, 1856. Tappen.—Lovelace (1669) quoted by Rutenber, Tribes Hudson R., 68, 1872. Tappensees.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, VI, 147, 1857 (from Tappansee). Tappents.—Wasenaar (1632) quoted by Rutenber, op. cit., 71.

Taqwayaum. A Ntlakyapamuk village on Fraser r., Brit. Col., below North bend; pop. 73 in 1901, when last reported.

Taqwayaum.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. II, 164, 1901. Takuyaum.—Ibid., 1893, 301, 1894. Tk'kōēau'm.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 5, 1899. Tkuayaum.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1892, 312, 1893. Tquayaum.—Ibid., 230, 1886. Tquayum.—Ibid., 277, 1894. Tqwayaum.—Ibid., 1898, 418, 1899.

Taraçones. Mentioned by Barcia (Ensayo, 272, 1723) as a people in the region of Texas where La Salle was killed. Probably Caddo, though Barcia, by the name he gives them, seems to connect them with the Faraon Apache.

Taraha. A tribe or village mentioned by Douay in 1687 as situated N. E. of the Quanoatino, which was really the Caddo name of Red r. of Texas. This section was within the territory of the southern Caddoan group, to which the Taraha may possibly have belonged.

Tarahumare (Hispanized form of the native name Ralámari, of obscure meaning, but probably signifying 'foot-runners.'—Lumholtz). A tribe of the Piman family, occupying a territory extending from about lat. 26° to 29°, between lon. 106° and 108° W., embracing the headwaters of the principal streams of southern Sonora and Chihuahua, particularly the Rio Fuerte, in the Sierra Madre. This area is regarded by them as the middle of the world, the belief, similar to that of the Pueblos, having a like origin, no doubt, in their early migrations from the N. and E. They are described as very primitive, for while they readily accepted the teachings of the Spanish missionaries, the number of baptized in 1678 being given as 8,300, they were not permanently affected by them, as the Christianized portion of the tribe are said to be rapidly relapsing into their former aboriginal condition.

The Tarahumare men are vigorous, of medium size, having a dark complexion, a scanty beard, which is plucked as soon as it appears, but long, thick, black hair, which is sometimes twisted into a braid and held in place by a woolen or palm-leaf headband. They are probably the finest runners of all the Indian tribes. They are said to be able to outstrip any horse in a sufficiently long race, having been known to cover more than 100 m. in a day. In their foot races, in which they kick a ball before them, good runners make 40 m. in from 6 to 8 hours. The women also have races in which a wooden ball propelled by a forked stick, or a ring of twisted fiber, kept in motion by a long curved stick, is employed. They formerly tattooed the forehead, lips, and cheeks in various patterns. The principal article of dress of the men is a blanket of native weave, and a shirt belted in, while the women cover the lower part of the body with a woolen skirt only. Sandals, and sometimes straw hats, are worn. Woman holds a comparatively high place in the family life. She is consulted as to bargaining, but on the whole is regarded as inferior to the man. The Tarahumare generally live in hovels in the barren mountains in summer and in caves in winter. Although they are not nomadic, they remove their domestic animals according to the seasons and plant corn in different localities. On the highlands the settlements are more permanent and there the best wooden houses are found, and sometimes ranches containing 5 or 6 families; but even in the highlands a Tarahumare never lives all his life in the same house, for, if an occupant dies, the dwelling is razed. A man sometimes moves his house away because the site is a good one for planting corn, the earth having been enriched by habitation.

They subsist mainly on corn, deer, squirrels, iguanas, mice, and rats, hunting game with the bow and arrow, as firearms are virtually unknown among them. Fish are obtained in large quantities by poisoning the streams, by shooting them with arrows tipped with cactus spines, and by draining pools and capturing the fish in the mud. Maize, beans, chile, tobacco, and potatoes are cultivated in small garden patches formed by rude stone walls constructed along the mountain slopes to retain the soil washed from the heights; they also raise sheep and goats on a small scale, but do not tame the turkey, the eagle, or other birds or animals. Chinaca, a juicy species of thistle, is highly relished, as are also the berries of the madroña, and the secretion of a plant louse, which is gathered, rolled into thick brown sticks, and preserved for winter use. Hunting, arrow making, tillage, and the manufacture of rattles and rasping sticks used as musical instruments are work of the men, while the women prepare the food and are the potters and weavers of the tribe. Among other ceremonials the tribe has planting and harvest dances, and on occasions of thanksgiving they sacrifice meat and an intoxicant prepared from maize. They are said to worship a number of plants, among them being the peyote, from which also is manufactured an intoxicating drink. Mescal also is made and drunk by them. In addition to their celebrated foot races they have games similar to our quoits and shinny; knuckle-bones are used as dice. Their greatest gambling game, known as quinze (Span. 'fifteen'), is played with 4 sticks inscribed with their different values. Their docile character contributed to their reduction by the Spanish missionaries and settlers, notwithstanding their large number, which even now reaches 30,000 and by some is estimated at 40,000. Besides the Tarahumare proper, the tribe includes the Varohio, Guazapar, Pachera, and Tubare. (See Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., 1902.)

The names of the settlements of the Tarahumare proper almost invariably terminate in the locative chik, or chiki, shortened by the Mexicans to chi. They are: Aboreachic, Achvarachki, Akachwa, Akawiruchic, Aoreachic, Ariziochic, Bacaburiachic, Baqueachic, Baquiarichic, Basaseachic, Basigochic, Bawiranachiki, Bichechic, Bocoyna, Cajurachic, Carichic, Chahichic, Chalachiki, Chichiveachic, Chueachiki, Chugita, Chuhuirari, Chuyachic, Cocomorachic, Cusihiurichic, Coyachic, Cusarare, Galilali, Garabato, Guachochic, Guajochic, Guasigochic, Guazarachic, Gueguachic, Gumi-sachic, Humarisa, Igualali, Ippo, Iso-guichic, Jicamorachic, Kawirasachic, Kichye, Kuchichic, Kuechic, Makawichic, Mamorachic, Matachic, Mategarele, Nakarori, Napuchic, Nararachic, Naverachic, Nonoava, Norogachic, Ohuivo, Pa-gaichic, Pahuirachic, Panalachic, Papa-jichic, Papigochic, Rahasalali, Raiabo, Rararachi, Rasanachic, Reechochic, Re-keachic, Rekorichic, Rekuvirachi, Reku-wichic, Relosoa, Kera-wachic, Resochiki, Retawichic, Richuchic, Rocheachic, Sa-guarichic, Sapechichic, Saweachic, Te-huerichic, Tejolocachic, Temechic, Temo-sachic, Tepachic, Teporachic, Tomochic, Tonachic, Trusiachic, Turasi, Uruachic, Vachinapuchic, Vaeachachic, Vahichic, Vakasuachiki, Valebo, Vasoreachic, Vawerachic, Vechaochic, Verachic, Vicharachic, Wiktosachki, Yoquibo.

In addition to these the pueblos of Chinatu and Santa Ana contained both Tarahumare and Tepehuane, while Huexotitlan, Maguina, Tosanachic, Tutuaca, and Yepachic are inhabited by both Tepehuane and Nevome. (F. W. H.)

Larámari.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894 (own name). Tarahumara.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864. Tarahumares.—Benavides, Memorial, 7, 1630. Tarahumari.—Lumholtz in *Mem. Int. Cong. Taraichi. A Pima settlement in E. Sonora, Mexico, lat. 29° 20', lon. 108° 30', not far from the Chihuahua frontier. Pop. 96 in 1730, at which date it appears to have been a sub-mission of Santa Rosalia Onapa.

Angeles Taraichi.—Rivera (1730) cited by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 514, 1884.

Taraichi. A pueblo occupied by the Hizo division of the Varohio, in Chinipas valley, lat. 27° 30', w. Chihuahua, Mexico. It was the seat of the mission of Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe.

Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe de Voragios.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 324, 1864. Taraichi.—Ibid.

Tarapin. See Terrapin.

Tarbogan. See Toboggan.

Tareguano. An unidentified tribe represented in considerable numbers at the Camargo mission, on the Rio Grande in Mexico, between 1757 and 1800 (Cuervo, Revista, 1757, MS. in Archivo Gen.; Baptismal records in the church at Camargo, cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1907).

Tareguano.—Cuervo, op. cit., 1757.

Tareque. A large village of straw houses in 1541, apparently in the Quivira region and probably occupied by the Wichita, at that time living evidently in E. Kansas.

Taracari.—Freytas, Peñalosa, 28, 58, 1882 (given as the chief city of Quivira). Tareque.—Coronado (1541) in Doc. Inéd., XIV, 327, 1870. Tuxeque.—Coronado (1541) in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., I, 158, 1857.

Tares. The "tribe" among whom the mission of Santa Clara, Cal., was founded at a site called Thamien (Engelhardt, Franc. in Cal., 324, 1897). The word is, however, only the term for 'man,' not a tribal name.

Targheliichetunne ('people at the mouth of a small stream'). A former village of the Tututni on the N. side of Rogue r., Oreg.

Ta-rxe'-li i-tce' junné'.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folklore, III, 233, 1890. T'a-rxi'-li i-toét' junné'.—Ibid. (Naltunnetunne name).

Targhinaatun. A former village of the Tolowa on the Pacific coast N. of Crescent, Cal.

Ta-rxi'-a-a'-tân.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 236, 1890.

Targhutthotunne ('people on the prairie sloping gently to the river'). A former Tututni village near the coast in Oregon. Ta'-a-t'go' jûnné.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 233, 1890 (Naltunnetunne name). Ta'-rxât-t'go jûnné.—Ibid.

Tarhe ('crane'). A noted Wyandot chief of the Porcupine clan, born at Detroit in 1742, died at Cranetown, near Upper Sandusky, Wyandot co., Ohio, in Nov. 1818. He was called Le Chef Grue, or Monsieur Grue, by the French; the English knew him as Crane. When in his prime Tarhe was a lithe, wiry man, capable of great endurance. He fought at Point Pleasant on the Kanawha under Cornstalk in 1774, and it is said that, of the thirteen chiefs who participated in the battle of Maumee Rapids, or Fallen Timbers, in 1794, when the Indians met with such disastrous defeat at the hands of Wayne, Tarhe was the only one to escape, and he was badly wounded in the arm. Largely through his influence, and in the face of great opposition, the treaty of Greenville in 1795 was made possible, and he ever after held its provisions inviolate, even to opposing Tecumseh's war policy from 1808 until the War of 1812. He remained faithful to the American cause during this conflict, and, although more than 70 years of age, marched at the head of his warriors through the whole of Gen. Harrison's campaign into Canada, and participated in the battle of the Thames, Oct. 5, 1813, in which Tecumseh was slain. From the close of the war until his death in 1818, Tarhe became well known to the settlers in central Ohio, "many of whom were honored by his friendship and benefited by his influence." Harrison described him in 1814 as a "venerable, intelligent, and upright man," and at another time, while speaking highly of several important chiefs with whom he had been largely in contact, he designated Chief Crane as the noblest of them all. He was chief priest of his tribe, and as such was the keeper of the calumet which bound the tribes N. of the Ohio in a confederation for mutual benefit and protection. After his death a mourning council was held at Upper Sandusky, attended by representatives of all the tribes of Ohio, the Delawares of Indiana, and the Seneca of New York, among the noted chiefs present being Red Jacket. The exact place of his burial is unknown. See Taylor in Ohio Arch. and Hist. Quar., ix, no. 1, 3, 1900.

Taronas-hadai (Tā'rō nas :had'ā'i, 'copper house people'). Given by Boas (5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 27, 1889) as the name of a subdivision of the Yakulanas, a Haida family of the Raven clan in Alaska. It in reality refers only to a house name, tā'go naas, belonging to that family.

Tarpon. A name, variously spelled, for a game-fish (Megalops atlanticus) of the warmer waters of the Atlantic, and which has extended to an East Indian species. The name, which does not belong to any Indian language of the United States, although the contrary has been inferred, appears for the first time in Ligon's History of Barbadoes (1673), and is well known in some of its forms in Guiana and Central America. (W. B. G.)

Tarrypin. See Terrapin.

Tarthem. A Salish band formerly under Fraser superintendency, Brit. Col.—Can. Ind. Aff., 79, 1878.

Tasagi's Band. One of the two divisions of the Wahpekute. They had a village of 550 persons on Des Moines r. in 1836.

Tab sau gaa.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 612, 1853. Tasagi's band.—Flandreau in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., III, 387, 1880.

Tasaning. An unidentified tribe, or possibly a band, named after a chief, that sided with the English in the French and Indian war.—Doc. of 1756 quoted by Rupp, Northampton Co., 106, 1845.

Tasawiks (Tásawiks). A Paloos village on the N. bank of Snake r., about 15 m. above its mouth, in S. E. Washington.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 735, 1896.

Tascalusa. A powerful chief, apparently of the ancient Alibamu tribe, who commanded the Indians against the Spaniards of De Soto's army in the battle of Mabila, Oct. 18, 1540, described by the historian Bancroft as probably the greatest Indian battle ever fought within the United States. The name signifies 'Black Warrior', from Choctaw and Alibamu taska 'warrior,' lusa 'black.' It occurs also as Taszaluza, Tascaluca, Tastaluca, and Tuscaluca, and is perpetuated in Black Warrior r. and Tuscaloosa town, Ala. He is described by the historians of the expedition, at his first meeting with De Soto, as very tall and strongly built, symmetrical and handsome in appearance, with an air of haughty dignity, seated upon a raised platform with his son beside him and his principal men around, one of whom held erect a sort of banner of deerskin curiously painted. His head was covered with a turban in the fashion of the Gulf tribes, and over his shoulders was thrown a feather mantle which reached to his feet. He looked on with contempt at the equestrian exercises with which the Spaniards strove to impress him, and gave unwilling ear to their demands for burden carriers and provisions, but when threatened by De Soto replied that he would send messengers ahead to his principal town of Mabila to order all to be prepared. Instead of this, however, he instructed the messengers to call in all the fighting men of his tribe to Mabila, a stockaded town apparently on lower Alabama r., to attack the Spaniards. On the arrival of the advance guard of the Spaniards they unloaded their baggage in the public square, the Indians being apparently friendly and receiving them with a dance of welcome; but while this was going on some of the soldiers noticed them concealing bundles of bows and arrows under branches of trees, and on entering one of the houses the upper platforms near the roof were found filled with armed warriors. De Soto, on being warned, at once made preparations for defense and sent for the chief, who refused to come. An attempt to seize him precipitated the battle, in which the Spaniards were at first driven out of the town, followed by the Indians, who had freed the Indian burden carriers of the Spaniards from their chains and given them bows and arrows to use against the white men. In the open country outside the town the Spaniards were able to use their cavalry, and although the Indians desperately opposed their naked bodies, with bow and arrow, to the swords, long lances, and iron armor of the Spanish horsemen for a whole day, the town was at last set on fire and those who were not cut down outside were driven back into the flames. Men, women, and children fought, and many deliberately committed suicide when they saw that the day was lost. Of about 580 Spaniards engaged some 20 were killed outright, and 150 wounded, despite their horses and protective armor, besides which they lost a number of horses, all their baggage, and some 200 pounds of pearls. De Soto himself was wounded and his nephew was among the killed. The lowest estimate of the Indian loss was 2,500 men, women, and children killed. The fate of Tascalusa was never known, but the body of his son was found thrust through with a lance.

The synonymy following refers to the tribe or district of which Tascalusa was chief.

Tasiusarsik. A village of the Angmag-salingmiut Eskimo at the entrance of the fjord of Angmagalik, E. Greenland, lat. 65° 40'. Pop. 35 in 1884.—Meddelelser om Grönland, IX, 379, 1889.

Taskigi (Ta'ski'gi, abbreviated from Ta'skigi'yī or Da'skigi'yī). The name of two former Cherokee towns: (1) on Little Tennessee r., above the junction of the Tellico, in Monroe co., Tenn.; (2) on the N. bank of Tennessee r., just below Chattanooga, Tenn. A third may have been on Tuskegee cr. of Little Tennessee r., near Robbinsville, Graham co., N. C. The name belonged originally to a foreign tribe which was incorporated partly with the Cherokee and partly with the Creeks. It would seem most probable that they were of Muskogean affinity, but it is impossible to establish the fact, as they have been long extinct, although there is still a "white" or peace town among the Creeks in Oklahoma, bearing their name.

In the townhouse of their settlement at the mouth of the Tellico they had an upright pole, from the top of which hung their protecting "medicine," the image of a human figure cut from a cedar log. For this reason the Cherokee sometimes called the place A'tsind'-k'ta'ûn, 'Hanging-cedar place.' Before the sale of the land in 1819 they were so nearly extinct that the Cherokee had moved in and occupied the ground. The name is variously written Teeskege, Tuscagee, Tuskegee, etc.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 388, 389, 534, 1900. Cf. Tuskegee.

A'tsind'-k'ta'ûn.—Mooney op. cit., 511 ('hanging cedar place'; a Cherokee name). Teskegee.—Timberlake, Memoirs, map, 1765 (just above the mouth of Tellico). Tuskege.—Bartram, Trav., 372, 1792 (synonym of Taskigi No. 1). Tuskegee.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887.

Tasquaringa. A Tepehuane pueblo about 15 leagues from Durango, Mexico. Though a few Mexicans live among them, the inhabitants are little affected by civilization.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., I, 469, 1902.

Tasqui.—Mentioned by Juan de la Vandra (Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., 18, 1859) as a village visited by Juan Pardo in 1557; situated two days' journey from Tasquiqui, identified with Tuskegee, Ala. It was probably inhabited by the Creeks.

Tasqui. A former important village of the Tuscarora of North Carolina, situated in 1711 a day's journey from Cotechna on the way to Ratoway, which was probably Nottoway village. At that time Tasqui was fortified with palisades; its cabins stood in a circle within the line of the palisades, and were neatly constructed of bark. Within the circle was the assembly place; it was here that the delegate of Gov. Spotswood held a conference with the Tuscarora chiefs from Cotechna regarding the freedom of De Graffenried, who was held a prisoner by the Tuscarora. See Pasqui. (J. N. B. H.)

Pasqui.—De Graffenried in N. C. Col. Rec., I, 937, 1886.

Tassinong. A former village, probably of the Potawatomi, in Porter co., Ind., near the present town of the same name.—Hough in Indiana Geol. Rep., map, 1883.

Tastaluca. See Tascalusa.

Tasunmatunne. A Chastacosta village in the Rogue r. country, w. Oreg.

Taszalusa. See Tascalusa.

Tatagua. A tribe, numbering 231 in 1862, mentioned by Wentworth as on Ft Tejon res. in s. central California, and also by Taylor in 1863 (Cal. Farmer, May 8, 1863) as of uncertain location. They can not be satisfactorily identified, but were a division either of the Yokuts, the Chumash, or the Shoshoneans.

Tatagua.—Ibid.

Tatankachesli ('dung of a buffalo bull').

A band of the Sans Arcs Sioux.

Tatanka cœli.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 219, 1897. Tatanka-teali.—Ibid.

Tatapowis. A town of the Wiweakam and Komoyue, gentes of the Lekwiltok, situated on Hoskyn inlet, Brit. Col.

Ta-ta-pow-is.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 65, 1887.

Tatarrax. A chief mentioned by Gomara (Hist. Gen. Indias, cap. ccxiii, 1553) in connection with Coronado's expedition to Quivira. He is believed to have been the same as the chief of the province of Harahey, identified as the Pawnee country, who, pursuant to a summons from Coronado while at Quivira, evidently on Kansas r., Kans., late in the summer of 1541, visited the Spaniards with 200 warriors armed with bows and "some sort of things on their heads," seemingly referring to the Pawnee mode of hair dressing. If the two are identical, Tatarrax is described as "a big Indian with large body and limbs, and well proportioned (Winship in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 492, 590, 1896). A monument was erected to his memory by the Quivira Historical Society at Manhattan, Kans., in the spring of 1905. Humboldt (New Spain, II, 324, 1811), probably from early maps, erroneously mentions Tatarrax as a kingdom "on the banks of the lake of Tegwayo, near the Rio del Aguilar." (F. W. H.)

Tateke (Tä'teqe). A Cowichan tribe on Valdes id. (the second of the name), s. E. of Vancouver id. and n. of Galiano id., Brit. Col.; apparently identical with the Lyacksun of the Canadian Indian reports. Pop. 80 in 1909.

Li-icks-sun.—Can. Ind. Aff., 308, 1879. Lyach-sun.—Ibid., 270, 1889. Lyacksun.—Ibid., pt. II, 164, 1901. Lyacksun.—Ibid., 220, 1902. Tä'teqe.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Tatemy, Moses Fonda (alias Tadema, Tattema, Titami, Totami, Old Moses, Tundy). A famous Delaware chief, interpreter and messenger for the Province of Pennsylvania. He was born on the E. side of the Delaware, somewhere near Cranberry, N. J., in the latter part of the 17th century. He acted as an interpreter for the English at an early date, as in 1737 he was given a tract of about 300 acres on Lehiehtan cr. (now Bushkill cr.), near Stockertown, Northampton co., for his various services to the province. He was living on this tract in 1742. At that date he and several other Delaware Indians presented a petition to the Council of Pennsylvania, in which it was stated that they had embraced the Christian faith, and asked that they be given permission to live under the laws and be granted the rights of the province. Gov. Thomas called them before the Council, and after examining them, decided that they knew "little, if anything," about the Christian religion. He also thought that their reason for making this request was in order that they might evade the Iroquois injunction to remove to Shamokin or to Wyoming. Tatemy then asked that he be permitted to live on the land that had been granted to him by the Proprietors of the province. After much discussion the governor decided to allow him to remain, if the Iroquois would give their consent (Col. Rec. Pa., iv, 624-625, 1851). This action was important, in that it shows the beginning of the Iroquois ascendancy in the affairs of the province. This permission was given by the Iroquois, as Tatemy continued to live on his tract for years afterward—if not until his death. His house became one of the landmarks in the region, being situated on the trails leading into the Minisink and near to the Moravian settlements at Nazareth and Bethlehem. Zinzendorf and his party stopped at his house in 1742. He was baptized by David Brainerd, whom he had served as interpreter, on July 21, 1745, at the Indian village of Sakhawotung (q. v.), when he received the name of Moses Fonda Tatemy (Mem. Moravian Church, 27, 1870). At the conference at Crosswicks, at which Tedyuskung (q. v.) was present, he presented various papers giving him the power of attorney to dispose of various lands in New Jersey (Arch. Pa., iii, 344, 1853). From this time he was prominent in all the councils and treaties at Philadelphia and Easton, being associated with Tedyuskung in the attempt to win back the Delawares, chiefly the Minisink, to friendly relations with the province. He served at all these treaties as an interpreter, and was sent on various important missions with Isaac Still and others. (The journal of his mission to Minisink is given in Arch. Pa., ii, 504-508, 1852.) In 1757, when Tedyuskung and a party of more than 200 Indians were on their way to the council at Easton (which had been brought about by much trouble), Tatemy's son William, who had strayed from the party, was shot by an Irish lad (Arch. Pa., iii, 209, 1853; also Mem. Moravian Church, 334, 1870). This affair threatened to break the peace negotiations. The Delawares were much angered by the outrage and threatened to avenge the death of the young man. Young Tatemy was taken to the house of a farmer, John Jones, near Bethlehem, where he was attended by Dr Otto, who reported the case to Justice Horsfield and Gov. Denny (Arch. Pa., iii, 207, 251, 1853; Mem. Moravian Church, 336-337, 1870). At the treaty at Easton, Tedyuskung spoke of the affair and demanded that, if the young man die, the boy who shot him be tried and punished, according to law, before a deputation of Indians. The governor replied, expressing his sorrow to the father, who was present, and promising that the crime should be punished (Col. Rec. Pa., vii, 674, 1851). After lingering a month young Tatemy died on Aug. 1, being attended in his illness by the Moravian brethren. He was buried at Bethlehem, near "the Crown," in the presence of more than 200 Indians, Rev. Jacob Rogers conducting the services. (The expenses of the funeral and the entertainment of 215 Indians are given in Mem. Moravian Church, 349.) Heckewelder is in error in stating that Tatemy, the Delaware chief, was killed (Ind. Nat., Mem. Hist. Soc. Pa., xii, 302, 337, 1876). The old chief was present at the council at Philadelphia the next fall, where he acted as interpreter. The difficulties were adjusted with the chief and with Tedyuskung. He died some time in 1761, as his name does not appear in any of the records after that year. Heckewelder (op. cit., 337) says that he was loved by all who knew him. A town in Forks township, Northampton co., Pa., perpetuates the name of the old chief. (G. P. D.)

Taterat. An Eskimo village in Aneretok fjord, s. e. coast of Greenland; pop. 20 in 1829.—Graah, Exped. E. Coast Greenland, map, 1837.

Tatlitkutchin ('Peel river people'). A Kutchin tribe, closely allied to the Tukuthkutchin, living on the E. bank of Peel r., Brit. Col., between lat. 66° and 67°. For a part of the season they hunt on the mountains, uniting sometimes with parties of the Tukuthkutchin. They confine their hunting to the caribou, as they no longer have moose hunters among them. In 1866 they numbered 30 hunters and 60 men.

Tatpōs (T'atpō's). An extinct Salish tribe formerly occupying the E. part of the larger Valdes id., E. coast of Vancouver id., and speaking the Comox dialect.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Tatquinto. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Tatsakutchin ('rampart people') A subdivision of the Kutchakutchin formerly dwelling on both sides of Yukon r., Alaska, at the mouth of Tanana r. They numbered about 50 hunters, who visited Ft Yukon yearly prior to 1863, but in that year they, with the Tennuthkutchin, were destroyed by scarlet fever. At the junction of these streams was a neutral trading point or village, Nuklukayet, originally belonging to the Tenankutchin, where all the tribes inhabiting the banks of the rivers were accustomed to meet in the spring. Besides this village the Tatsakutchin resided in Senati.

Tatsanottine ('people of the scum of water,' scum being a figurative expression for copper). An Athapascan tribe, belonging to the Chipewyan group, inhabiting the northern shores and eastern bays of Great Slave lake, Mackenzie Dist., Canada. They were said by Mackenzie in 1789 to live with other tribes on Mackenzie and Peace rs. Franklin in 1824 (Journ. Polar Sea, I, 76, 1824) said that they had previously lived on the S. side of Great Slave lake. Gallatin in 1836 (Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., II, 19, 1856) gave their location as N. of Great Slave lake on Yellow Knife r., while Back placed them on the W. shore of Great Slave lake. Drake (Bk. Inds., VII, 1848) located them on Coppermine r.; Richardson (Arct. Exped., II, 4, 1851) gave their habitat as N. of Great Slave lake and from Great Fish r. to Coppermine r. Hind in 1863 (Labrador Penin., II, 261, 1863) placed them N. and N. E. of Great Slave lake, saying that they resorted to Ft Rae and also to Ft Simpson on Mackenzie r. Petitot in 1865 (MS., B. A. E.) said they frequent the steppes E. and N. E. of Great Slave lake; but 10 years later (Dict. Dènè-Dindjié, xx, 1876) he located them about the E. part of the lake. They were more nomadic than their neighbors, which doubtless accounts for the wide area ascribed to them by some of the earlier travelers who met them during their hunting trips in territory belonging to the Etchareottine. Prior to 1850 they were in the habit of visiting the N. end of Great Bear lake to hunt muskoxen and reindeer; but many of their influential men were killed by treachery in a feud with the Thlingchadinne; since then they have kept more to the E. end of Great Slave lake. In their hunting trips northward they came in contact with the Eskimo residing near the mouth of Back r., with whom they were continually at war, but in recent years they seldom traveled farther coastward than the headwaters of Yellow Knife r., leaving a strip of neutral ground between them and their former enemies. According to Father Morice, "they now hunt on the dreary steppes lying to the N. E. of Great Slave lake," and that formerly they were "a bold, unscrupulous and rather licentious tribe, whose members too often took advantage of the gentleness of their neighbors to commit acts of highhandedness which finally brought down on them what we cannot help calling just retribution" (Anthropos, I, 266, 1906). Back, in 1836, stated that the Tatsanottine were once powerful and numerous, but at that time they had been reduced by wars to 70 families. Ross in 1859 (MS., B. A. E.) made the census for the Hudson's Bay Company as follows, but his figures evidently included only one band: At Ft Resolution, 207; at Ft Rae, 12; total, 219, of whom 46 males and 54 females were married, 8 unmarried adult males, 14 widows and unmarried females, 44 boys, and 53 girls, giving 98 males and 121 females of all ages. According to Father Morice they now number about 500, of whom 205 are at Ft Resolution. The Tatsanottine were the Montagnais (see Chipewyan) of the Hudson's Bay Company, for whom a special alphabet was designed and books printed in it by the English missionaries (see Pilling, Bibliog. Athapascan Lang., 1892). Petitot found them serious and religiously inclined like the Chipewyan, from whom they differed so slightly in physique and in language that no novice could tell them apart. They formerly manufactured, and sold at fabulous prices, copper knives, axes, and other cutting tools, according to Father Morice. The metal was found on a low mountain in the vicinity of the river called Coppermine r. by the traders on Hudson bay. The diffusion of iron and steel implements at length so depreciated the value of the aboriginal wares that, finding the main source of their revenue cut off through the new order of things, they finally moved to the s.

The Tatsanottine have a myth that one of their women was kidnaped and carried blindfolded off to the country of the Eskimo in Asia and married to one of these, and that she made her escape with her infant in an umiak, reached the shore of America by paddling from isle to isle of the Aleutian archipelago, being protected on the voyage by a white wolf. Reaching the shore of Alaska she abandoned her Eskimo child because it robbed her of pemmican she had made. Seeing a blazing mountain she ascended it, thinking to find a party camping on the summit. She found that the flames were emitted by a molten metal, and when eventually she reached the camp of her own people they accompanied her back by the path she had marked with stones to get some of the metal, which they called bear's dung or beaver's dung, because it was red. They thought she was a woman descended from the skies, but when they had made the journey for the third time some of them laid violent hands on her, whereupon she sat down beside her precious copper, refusing to go home with them. When they came back some time later to seek the volcano of molten copper, she was still there, but sunk to her waist into the earth. She gave them copper, but again refused to go back with them, putting no faith in their promises. She said she would give good metal to those who brought her good meat, iron if the gift were lung, liver, or heart of the caribou, copper for whomsoever gave red flesh, but if any one brought bad meat they would get brittle metal in return. Those who came back later for more metal found her buried to the neck in the ground. The last time they came she had disappeared in the bowels of the earth, and from that time no more copper could be found on the bank of Copper r., though there may still be seen the huge stones which the metal woman placed to mark the way. Her tribe have since been called the Copper People, for water scum and beaver dung are both figurative names for this metal.

Tattooing (tatu is of Tahitian origin; its equivalent in some of the languages to North America is derived from a roof meaning 'to mark,' 'to write'). The custom of tattooing prevailed to a greater or less extent over the entire country.

When an Eskimo girl reached maturity a line was tattooed from the edge of the lower lip to the point of the chin; later two or more lines were added to mark her as a married woman. With western Eskimo men the tattoo mark meant personal distinction; sometimes successful whalers had the tally of their catches pricked upon the cheek, chest, or arms. Occasionally the wife of such a man had an extra mark put at the corner of her mouth. Along the Pacific coast both men and women were tattooed on the face and body, a custom that recently reached its most ornate development among the Haida of Queen Charlotte Ids. The designs were of conventionalized "totemic" figures, and seem to have indicated personal or tribal distinction rather than any religious cult. On the middle Atlantic coast geometric designs were tattooed on the person so as to have a decorative effect. The same type of design was incised on the pottery of that region (Holmes in 20th Rep. B. A. E., 151). Tattooing was extensively practised among the tribes of the interior. The Wichita, because of their profuse use of this decoration, were known to the French as "Pain Piqué." Cabeza de Vaca, about 1530 mentions the use of colors, red and blue, in tattooing by the tribes of the Gulf of Mexico, a custom similar to that which still obtains among the Haida of the N. Pacific coast. Vases have been found in the mounds of the middle Mississippi valley showing the human face with tattoo marks, some of the designs combining geometric and totemic figures. As tattooing gave a permanent line, it served a different purpose from decoration by paint. Among men it marked personal achievement, some special office, symbolized a vision from the supernatural powers, or served some practical purpose, as among the Hupa, where the men have "10 lines tattooed across the inside of the left arm about half way between the wrist and the elbow," for the purpose of measuring strings of "shell money" (Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 76, 1877). Among the Ojage a peculiar design was tattooed on the hereditary keepers of the tribal pipes; when one so marked was successful in war and had cut off the head of an enemy, a skull was added to the design, which covered much of his breast and back. Among women the tattooing was more social in its significance. The connection between pottery and basket designs and those tattooed on the face or body of a woman has been noted. Among the Kiowa the tribal mark was a circle on the forehead of the woman. With the Omaha and some of their cognates a small round spot on the forehead of a girl, and a four-pointed star on the back and breast, were marks of honor to signify the achievements of her father or near of kin. In other tribes certain lines on the face indicated the marriageable or married woman.

HAIDA TATTOOING (MALLERY)

The Chippewa sometimes resorted to tattooing as a means of curing pain, as the toothache. The process of tattooing was always attended with more or less ceremony; chants or songs frequently accompanied the actual work, and many superstitions were attached to the manner in which the one operated upon bore the pain or made recovery. Most tribes had one or more persons expert in the art who received large fees for their services.

Among the Omaha and cognate tribes the instrument latterly used was a bunch of steel needles fastened tightly in leather, making a kind of stiff brush. The ink was made from charred box-elder wood. The device was first outlined with the ink and the flesh within the outline carefully pricked. The pricking was done twice during the operation to insure a solid figure. Formerly sharp flint points were used for needles. According to Hrdlička, in the S. W. cactus spines served as needles, and charcoal formed the ink. The dyes injected to give color to the design varied in different parts of the country.

Tattowhehallys (probably intended for tálua hallui, 'upper town'). A town, probably of the Seminole, mentioned by Morse (Rep. to Sec. War, 364, 1822) as "scattered among the other towns," i. e. Lower Creek and Seminole, probably in n. w. Florida or s. Georgia, on Chattahoochee r.

Tatumasket. A Nipmuc village in 1675 in the s. part of Worcester co., Mass., w. of Mendon.—N. H. Hist. Soc. Coll., II, 8, note, 1827.

Tatuppequanog. A village occupied in 1638 by a part of the conquered Pequot, situated on Thames r., below Mohegan, New London co., Conn.—Williams (1638) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., vi, 251, 1863.

Tausitu. Given as a Cherokee town in a document of 1799 (Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887). Possibly identical with Tlanusiya or Taseti.

Tauskus. A village in 1608 on the e. bank of Patuxent r., in Calvert co., Md.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Tautang. See Tautog.

Tautin (Iau'tenne, 'sturgeon people'). A sept of the Takulli living on Fraser r. about old Ft Alexander, Brit. Col., once an important post of the Hudson's Bay Co., now abandoned. They were originally some hundreds in number, but died off from the effects of alcohol and loose morals until not 15 were left in 1902 (Morce, Notes on W. Dénés, 24, 1902). Their village, Stella, was contiguous to the fort.

Tautog. The blackfish (Tautoga americana) of the New England seacoast; written also tautang. Roger Williams (1643), in his Narraganset vocabulary, has "tautauog, sheepheads." It is from this plural form of the word in the Algonquian dialect of Rhode Island that tautog has been derived. The Indian singular form is taut, or tautau. Trumbull (Natick Dict., 332, 1903) appears not to confirm the statement of Dr J. V. C. Smith that "tautog is a Mohegan word meaning 'black.'"

W. R. Gerard (inf'n, 1909) says: "From the fact that Rosier, in an Abnaki vocabulary collected in Maine in 1605, gives tattaucke (tatauk) as the name for the conner, a closely related fish, it would seem that tautang is not a plural form, and that the name was not confined to the Narraganset."
(A. F. C.)

Tauxenent. A tribe of the Powhatan confederacy, with principal village of the same name, estimated by Smith (1608) at 40 warriors, or perhaps 150 souls; situated on the s. bank of the Potomac, in Fairfax co., Va., about the present Mount Vernon.

Tave (Ta'-ve). A clan of the Hopi, taking its name from an herb (Sarcobatus vermiculatus).—Voth, Hopi Proper Names, 109, 1905.

Tavibo ('white man'). A Paiute chief, born near Walker lake, Esmeralda co., Nev.; died there about 1870. He was famed as a medicine-man, and when the whites crowded the Indians out of the mountain valleys he was interrogated as to the hope of salvation. Having gone up into the mountains to receive a revelation, he prophesied that the earth would swallow the white people and the Indians enjoy their possessions. The people were incredulous about an earthquake that could discriminate between whites and Indians. A second vision revealed to him, therefore, that all would be engulfed, but the Indians would rise again and enjoy forever an abundance of game, fish, and piñon nuts. Shoshoni and Bannock, as well as Paiute, welcomed the pleasant tidings, and devotees flocked to him from Nevada, Idaho, and Oregon. When their faith began to wane he received a third revelation, according to which only believers in his prophecy would be resurrected, while skeptics would remain buried in the earth with the whites.—Capt. J. M. Lee quoted by Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 700, 1896.

Caddoan tribe of the Wichita group, best known on the middle Brazos and Trinity rs., Texas, in the 18th and 19th centuries. The name "Three Canes," sometimes applied to them, is a translation of the French form "Troiscanne," written evidently not as a translation of the native name, as has been claimed, but to represent its vocal equivalent. Mezières, for example, writing in French, used "Troiscanne" obviously as a vocal equivalent of Tuacana, a usual form of his when writing in Spanish (Letter of July 22, 1774, in Archivo Gen., Prov. Intern., xcix, Expediente, 1). In 1719 La Harpe visited, on the Canadian r., Okla., a settlement of 9 tribes which he collectively called "Tonacara," from the name of a leading tribe (Margry, Déc., vi, 278, 282, 289, 1886). That the Tawakoni, later known on the Brazos, were the same people is not perfectly clear, but it seems probable that they were. A fact that helps to establish their identity is that among the 9 tribes visited by La Harpe were the Toayas, Ousitas, and Ascanis, who appear to be the later known Tawehash, Wichita, and Yscani (Waco), close relatives of the Tawakoni and living near them in Texas in the latter part of the 18th century. These tribes all seem to have moved southward into Texas about the middle of the 18th century, being pushed by the hostile Osage from the n. e. and the Comanche from the n. w. (see La Harpe, op. cit., 293). The exact nature and time of the Tawakoni migration, however, are not clear. By 1772 they were settled in two groups on the Brazos and Trinity, about Waco and above Palestine, but there are indications that this settlement was recent and subsequent to considerable wandering. For example, in 1752 De Soto Vermudez (Investigation, 1752, MS.) was informed at the Nasoni village, on the upper Angelina, that the "Tebancanas" were a large nation, recently increased by the Pelones, and living 20 leagues to the northward, with the Tonkawa and Yojuane beyond them. If the direction was correctly given, they must have been somewhere near the upper Sabine. In 1760 and 1761 Fray Calahorra, missionary at Nacogdoches, visited the Tawakoni; they were then living in two neighboring villages, near a stream and five days from the Tawehash, who were then on Red r. below the mouth of the Wichita. These villages seem to have been the same as those mentioned below as found by Mezières on the Trinity in 1772, though they may have been on the Brazos, for the information here is not explicit (Lopez to Parilla, 1760, in Expediente sobre Mision San Saba, Archivo Gen.; Testimonio de Diligencias, Béxar Archives, Province of Texas, 1754-76, MSS.). In 1768 Solís reported the Tawakoni and Yscani as ranging between the Navasota and the Trinity (Diario in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 279); they had evidently settled in the general locality that was to be their permanent home. In 1770 allusion is made to a migration, as a result of peace established with the Spaniards, from the neighborhood of San Antonio and San Sabá, where they had been located for the purpose of molesting the Spanish settlements, to the neighborhood of the Nabadache, who were living on San Pedro cr., in n. e. Houston co. (Mezières, Relación, 1770, MS.). This residence near San Antonio was probably a temporary one of only a portion of the tribe, for the indications are that the country between Waco and Palestine was already their chief range. In 1772 Mezières speaks of the village on the Brazos as though it had been founded recently by a "malevolent chief" hostile to the Spaniards (Informe, July 4, 1772, MS.). Finally, for the migration, it appears that by 1779 the village on the Trinity had also moved to the Brazos, which for a long time thereafter was the principal home of the Tawakoni, who now again became a settled people.

With Mezières' report in 1772 the Tawakoni come into clear light. In that year he visited the tribe for the purpose of cementing a treaty recently made with them by the governors of Texas and Louisiana. One of their villages was then on the w. bank of the Trinity, about 60 m. n. w. of the Nabadache village, on a point of land so situated that in high water it formed a peninsula with only one narrow entry on the w. side. This location corresponds in general with that of the branch of the Trinity now called Tehaucana cr. This village consisted of 36 houses occupied by 120 warriors, "with women in proportion and an infinite number of children." The other village, of 30 families, was 30 leagues away on Brazos r., not far from Waco. Mezières tried to induce the inhabitants of this village to move eastward to the Trinity, farther away from the settlements. This they promised to do after harvest, but the promise was not kept. Mezières recommended the establishment of a presidio on the Tawakoni site when the Indians should be removed (Informe, July 4, 1772, MS.).

In 1778 and 1779 Mezières made two more visits to the Tawakoni. One village, containing 150 warriors, was then on the w. side of the Brazos, in a fertile plain protected from overflow by a high bank or bluff, at the foot of which flowed an abundant spring. Eight leagues above was another village of the same tribe, larger than the first, in a country remarkable for its numerous springs and creeks. It seems that this was the village that in 1772 had been on the Trinity, since for nearly half a century we do not hear of the Trinity village (Mezières, Carta, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 274-5). The lower village Mezières called Quiscat (q. v.), or El Quiscat, apparently from its head chief, a name which it kept at least as late as 1795. Morfi (Hist. Tex., ca. 1782, MS.) erroneously (?) says that Quiscat was a village of Kitchai and Yscani. The upper village was called Flechazo, and the inhabitants Flechazos, which often appears as a tribal name (Cabello, Informe, 1784, MS; Leal, Noticia, July 10, 1794. See also Flechazos).

The Tawakoni and the Waco speak dialects of the Wichita language and sometimes have been considered the same people. Mezières remarked that they lived apart only for convenience in hunting (Informe, July 14, 1772, MS.; Courbière, Relación Clara, 1791, Béxar Archives, MS.). This language, though kindred, is very distinct from that of their relatives, the Hasinai and the Kadohadacho, as was noted in the statement by an official at Nacogdoches in 1765 that two Hasinai chiefs "served as interpreters in their language, which I know, of what it was desired to ask the chief of the Taguais [Tawehash] nation, called Eiasiquiche" (Testimonio de los Diligencias, Béxar Archives, Prov. of Texas, 1754-76). In connection with the ethnological relations of the Tawakoni, the Waco require mention. They were apparently simply one of the Tawakoni villages, perhaps the Quiscat of Mezières' day. The name Waco has not been noted in early Spanish documents, nor does it occur at all, it seems, until the 19th century, when it is first applied by Americans to Indians of the village on the site of modern Waco, who are distinguished from those called Tawakoni living only 2 m. below (Stephen F. Austin, ca. 1822, Austin papers, Class D.; Thos. M. Duke to Austin, June, 1824, ibid., Class P).

The hereditary enemies of the Tawakoni were the Comanche, Osage, and Apache, but toward the end of the 18th century and thereafter the Comanche were frequently counted as allies. The hostility of the Tawakoni toward the Apache was implacable, and Apache captives were frequently sold by them to the French of Louisiana (Macartij, letter, Sept. 23, 1763). With the Hasinai and Caddo, as well as the Tonkawa and Bidai, the Tawakoni were usually at peace. Their villages were market places for the Tonkawa and a refuge for many apostate Jaraname (Aranama) from Bahía del Espíritu Santo.

As in former times, the Tawakoni resemble in methods of agriculture and house-building the other tribes of the Wichita confederacy (q. v.). The Spanish town of Bucareli on the Trinity depended on them in part for food. Austin (op. cit.) reported at the Waco village about 200 acres of corn fenced in with brush fences. According to Mezières (Informe, July 4, 1772) the Tawakoni ate their captives after the cruelest torture and left their own dead unburied in the open prairie.

Until about 1770 the Tawakoni, though friendly toward the French, were hostile to the Spaniards. In 1753, and several times thereafter, they were reported to be plotting with the Hasinai to kill all the Spaniards of E. Texas (De Soto Vermudez, Investigation; Mezières to Fr. Abad, 1758, MS.). The founding of San Sabá mission for the Apache increased this hostility of the Tawakoni, and in 1758 they took part with the Comanche, Tawehash, and others in the destruction of the mission. In 1760 Father Calahorra, of Nacogdoches, made a treaty of peace with the Tawakoni and Waco, but they soon broke it. During the next two years Calahorra made them other visits and got them to promise to enter a mission. Subsequently the mission project was often discussed, but never materialized (Testimonio de Diligencias, Béxar Archives, Prov. of Texas, 1759-76).

The transfer of Louisiana to Spain wrought a revolution in the relations between the Spaniards and the Tawakoni and other tribes. In 1770 Mezières, an expert Indian agent, and now a Spanish officer, met the Tawakoni and other tribes at the Kadohadacho village and effected a treaty of peace in the name of the governors of Louisiana and Texas (Mezières, Relación, Oct. 21, 1770). In 1772 he made a tour among these new allies and conducted the chiefs to Béxar, where, by the Feather dance, they ratified the treaty before Gov. Ripperdá. This friendship was cemented by a more liberal trading policy introduced by Gov. Oreilly of Louisiana (Mezières, Informe, July 4, 1772). The Tawakoni were now relied upon to force the Aranama (Jaraname) back to their mission and to restrain the more barbarous Tonkawa and induce them to settle in a fixed village, which was temporarily accomplished (Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 274). Friendly relations remained relatively permanent to the end of the Spanish regime. In 1778 and 1779 Mezières made two more visits to the Tawakoni villages. In 1796 the Tawakoni sent representatives to the City of Mexico to ask for a mission, and the matter was seriously discussed but decided negatively (Archivo Gen., Prov. Intern., xx, MS.). About 1820 they for some reason became hostile, but on Apr. 23, 1821, Gov. Martinez, through the mediation of the gran cadí, or Kadohadacho chief, effected a new treaty with the Tawakoni chiefs Daquiarique and Tacaréhue (Archivo Gen., Prov. Intern., CCL1).

By 1824 the upper Tawakoni village seems to have been moved back toward the Trinity, for in that year Thomas M. Duke, who described the Waco and the small Tawakoni village below them, stated that the principal Tawakoni village was on the waters of the Trinity (Austin Papers, Class P). To the Anglo-Americans the tribe frequently proved troublesome and were sometimes severely punished. They were included in the treaty made with the Republic of Texas in 1843 and also in the treaties between the United States and the Wichita in 1837 and 1856, which established their reservation in the present Oklahoma. In 1855 they were placed on a reservation near Ft Belknap, on the Brazos, and for 3 years they made progress toward civilization; but in 1859 they were forced by the hostility of the whites to move across Red r. (Bancroft, No. Mex. States, II, 406-410, 1889). Since then they have been officially incorporated with the Wichita (q. v.).

If the view that the Waco were only a part of the Tawakoni under a new name is correct, the Tawakoni suffered rather less diminution than other tribes during the half century after 1778. If the view is wrong, they decreased about half their number during that period. (H. E. B.)

Tawasa (Alibamu: Tawásha). A Muskogean tribe first referred to by the De Soto chroniclers in the middle of the 16th century as Toasi and located in the neighborhood of Tallapoosa r. Subsequently they moved s. e. and constituted one of the tribes to which the name "Apalachicola" was given by the Spaniards. About 1705 attacks by the Alibamu and Creeks compelled them to leave this region also and to seek protection near the French fort at Mobile. In 1707 the Pascagoula declared war against them, but peace was made through the intervention of Bienville. From this time the tribe ceased to be noted by French chroniclers, and at the close of the century it reappears as one of the four Alibamu towns, from which it seems likely that the Tawasa had allied or re-allied themselves with the Alibamu after the disturbance just alluded to. Their subsequent history is probably the same as that of the Alibamu (q. v.). (J. R. S.)

Tawehash (Ta-we'-hash, commonly known in early Spanish writings as Taovayas.) A principal tribe of the Wichita confederacy, distinct from the Wichita proper, although the terms are now used as synonymous. By the middle of the 18th century they had settled on upper Red r., where they remained relatively fixed for about a hundred years. Rumors of a tribe called the Teguayos, or Aijaos, who may have been the Tawehash, reached New Mexico from the E. early in the 17th century (Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 387, 1886). The Toayas found by La Harpe in 1719 on Canadian r. with the Touacara (Tawakoni), Ousitas (Wichita), and Ascanis (Hasinai) were evidently the Tawehash, and his report gives us our first definite knowledge of them (Margry, Déc., vi, 278, 282, 289, 1886). Their southward migration, due to pressure from the Osage, Chickasaw, and Comanche, was probably contemporary with that of their kinsfolk, the Tawakoni (q. v.). That their settlement on Red r. was relatively recent in 1759 is asserted by Antonio Tremiño, a Spanish captive who was released by the tribe in 1765 (Testimony of Tremiño, Aug. 13, 1765, MS. in Béxar Archives).

The Spaniards of New Mexico usually designated the Tawehash as the Jumanos (q. v.); the French frequently called them and the Wichita Pani piqué, or tattooed Pawnee, while to the Spaniards of San Antonio and the officials in Mexico they were uniformly the Taovayas (in varying forms of orthography) and Wichita (see Declaration of Pedro Latren at Santa Fé, Mar. 5, 1750, MS. in Archivo Gen.).

After La Harpe's visit, in 1719, the group of tribes to which the Tawehash belonged became attached, through trade, to the French, while on the other hand they saw little of the Spaniards. But from indifferent strangers the Tawehash and the Spaniards soon became converted into active foes through their differing relations to the Comanche and the Apache. To the Comanche and the Tawehash alike the Apache were a hated enemy, while the founding of San Sabá mission in 1757, for the Lipan Apache, put the Spaniards in the light of Apache allies. The result was the destruction of the mission in Mar. 1758, by a large force of Comanche, Wichita, Tawehash, and other northern Indians. To avenge this injury, Don Diego Ortiz Parrilla, a soldier of renown, was put in command of 500 men—regulars, militia, Tlascaltecan, and mission Indians—and equipped for a four months' campaign. Leaving San Antonio, in Aug. 1759, he marched with Apache allies to the Tawehash settlement, which he found flying a French flag, fortified by ditch and stockade, and so strongly defended that he was repulsed with loss of baggage-train and two cannon. Years afterward Bonilla wrote: "And the memory of this event remains to this day on the Taovayas frontier as a disgrace to the Spaniards" (Breve Compendio, 1772, trans. by West in Tex. Hist. Asso. Quar., viii, 55, 1905). The cannon were not recovered till 20 years later.

Parrilla's report of the Tawehash fortification was confirmed in 1765 by Tremiño, the released captive mentioned above. According to him it was built especially to resist Parrilla's attack. It consisted of a palisaded embankment about 4 ft high, with deep ditches at the E. and W. ends, to prevent approach on horseback. Inside the enclosure were 4 subterranean houses or cellars for the safety of non-combatants (Tremiño, op. cit.). From the time of Parrilla's campaign forward the Tawehash settlement was referred to in Spanish writings as the "fort of the Taovayas." Of interest in this connection is the record that the Waco, also of the Wichita group, had at their village a similar earthen wall or citadel which was still visible in the latter part of the 19th century (Kenney in Wooten, Comp. Hist. Texas, i, 745, 1898).

In 1760, the year after the famous battle, Fray Calahorra y Saenz, the veteran missionary at Nacogdoches, was sent to the fortaleza to effect a peace, which he accomplished, at least nominally (Fray Joseph Lopez to Parrilla, Exp. sobre San Sabá, MS. in Archivo Gen., 1760). The liberation of Tremiño in 1765 was attended with special marks of friendship. He was escorted to Nacogdoches by head chief Eyasiquiche, who was made a Spanish official and sent home with presents of a cane, a dress-coat, and three horses. He would not consent, however, to Calahorra's proposal of a mission for his people (Calahorra, letter of July 16, 1765, MS. in Béxar Archives). In spite of these signs of amity, the Spaniards still entertained suspicions of the Tawehash, but matters were improved by the efforts of Mezières, a skilful Indian agent. In 1770 he met the Tawehash, Tawakoni, Yscanis, and Kichai chiefs in a conference at the Kadohadacho (Caddo) village. The treaty arranged at this time was ratified at Natchitoches in Oct. 1771, by three Tawehash chiefs, who by proxy represented the Comanche also. Among other things, they promised to give up their Spanish captives and Parrilla's cannon, not to pass San Antonio in pursuit of the Apache without reporting there, and to deliver to the Spanish authorities the head of any violator of the peace. This compact was solemnized by the ceremony of burying the hatchet (Articles of peace, MS. in Archivo Gen., Hist., xx). From this time forward the Tawehash were generally named among the friendly tribes, but they were seldom trusted. They were, however, often turned against the Apache, and in 1813 they aided the revolutionists against the royal arms (Arredondo to the Viceroy, Sept. 13, 1813, MS. in Archivo Gen.). As a tribe they were never subjected to mission influence, which may be said of all the tribes of the Wichita confederacy.

In 1772, and again in 1778, Mezières visited the Tawehash settlement to further cement their friendship, and from his reports we get our fullest knowledge of their relationships and society. They spoke nearly or quite the same language as their kinsmen and allies, the Wichita, Tawakoni, and Yscani. Their settlement was situated on Red r., at the eastern Cross Timbers. At the time of Mezières' second visit it consisted of a population of 800 fighting men and youths, living in two villages on opposite banks of the river. That on the N. side was composed of 37 and the other of 123 grass lodges, each containing 10 or 12 beds. To these two villages Mezières at this time gave the names San Teodoro and San Bernardo, in honor of the commandant general of the interior provinces and of the governor of Louisiana. The Tawehash had extensive agriculture, raising corn, beans, calabashes, watermelons, and tobacco, with which they supplied the Comanche, in exchange for horses and captives. The calabashes they cut up in strips which, when dry, were made into chains or mats for convenience in carrying. Though fish were plentiful in the river, they are said not to have eaten them. Women took part in the government, which was democratic. Chiefs, who prided themselves on owning nothing, did not hold office by hereditary right, but were elected for their valor. Regarding the religion of the people Mezières mentioned "fire worship" and belief in a very material heaven and hell (see also Wichita).

There is some ground for thinking that one of the two villages of the Tawehash settlement described by Mezières in 1778 was composed of the Wichita tribe, who six years before had been living on Salt Fork of the Brazos, 60 leagues away. But the Wichita later were still living—a part of the time at least—on the upper Brazos. About 1777 or 1778 the "Panis-Mahas" (Ouvas, Aguajes, Agui-chi [see Akwech]) came southward and settled with the Tawehash, but at the time of Mezières' visit in 1778 they had withdrawn temporarily northwestward. Within a few months, however, they returned, and seem to have remained permanently with the Tawehash (Mezières, MS. letters in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 229, 281–82). They evidently established a separate village, for Fernandez in 1778 and Mares in 1789 each noted in this locality three Jumanes or Tawehash villages a short distance apart (diaries in the Archivo Gen.). Twenty years later Davenport said that on Red r., 100 leagues above Natchitoches, there were still three neighboring villages of these people, which he called the Tahuyás, Huichitas, and Agui-chi, respectively (Noticia, 1809, MS. in Archivo Gen.).

Austin's map of 1829 (original in the Department of Fomento, Mexico) and the Karte von Texas of 1839 both show the Tawehash settlement on Wichita r., above the junction of the two main branches. For their treaties with the United States and their removal to reservations, see Wichita (confederacy). Consult also Jumano. (H. E. B.)

Tawi. A Cholovone village on lower San Joaquin r., Cal.—Pinart, Cholovone MS., B. A. E., 1880.

Tawiskaron (Tawis'karron, Tawis'kara, Thauwiskalau (Oneida), Täwi'-skä-lä (Cherokee, 'Flint'), Tawiskano for

Tawiskārano', and Saiewiskerat. The nominal stem, dialectically varied, is in these expressions -wiskār-, -wisker-, or -wiskäl-, occurring in the lexical terms owiskärä', owiskerä', or owiskälä', respectively, and meaning 'ice', 'hail', 'sleet'; these latter are derivatives of the noun owis'd', 'ice', 'hail', 'sleet', 'frozen snow', 'glare ice', and 'glass goblet' (modern); of this noun the Tuscarora uwi'crä' is a dialectic form, whence comes uwi'sëkrä' with the specific meaning 'sleet or rain frozen to trees and to the ground'; and the initial t- of the first six appellatives is a characteristic prefix of proper names and is in fact an expletive dual sign, originally meaning 'two', 'two-fold', 'complete', 'in a double degree'; and the a- for the full ha-, affixed to the nominal stem, -wiskār-, is the prefix pronoun of the third person, masculine sex, singular number, and anthropic gender, signifying 'he'; lastly, the verb-stem -ron', suffixed to the nominal stem, is the perfect tense form of the anomalous verb-stem -rēn', 'affix or add to', or 'be arrayed in'; hence the expression Tawiskarron' signifies 'He is arrayed in ice in a double degree.' The expression Tawiskara, or rather Tawis'kärä', is the noun modified only by the affixes explained above, and signifies 'He (is) ice in a double degree', the substantive verb being unexpressed but understood. The final vowel and the glottic close of this compound is either modified or dropped when an adjective is suffixed to it, as in the following: The adjective -ano' signifies 'cold', 'chilly'; hence Tawiskarano' means 'He (is) ice, cold in a double degree.' The substantive verb, as is usual in the present tense of attributive themes, is not here expressed. In the sentence-word Saiewiskerat, one of the characteristic functions or activities of the personage designated by this expression is described. The initial syllable sa- signifies 'again', 'anew', 'repeatedly', and limits the meaning of the verb in the expression; ie- is the pronoun of the third person, indefinite as to sex and number, although usually singular, and commonly signifies 'one', 'one who'; the noun-stem is explained above; lastly, the suffix verb-stem -at, being the present tense form of the anomalous verb -at, signifies 'present', 'show', 'spread' 'cause to be present'; hence the expression as an appellative means 'Again one causes ice to be present (as is his habit)'. These etymologic derivations of a number of the appellatives applied to a certain personality would seem to connect him directly with the frost-bringing and the ice-forming potency in nature, and that they establish the inference that Tawiskaron is the name of the personification of the winter power transfigured into a man-being, a god of winter, whose functions and activities constitute him the mighty frost king, whose breath and magic power blight the verdure of plants and trees and lock lakes and rivers in bonds of ice. In confirmation of the preceding interpretations, the following expressions are cited from Bruyas' Radices Iroquæorum: owisê, or gawisa, 'ice', 'hail', 'glass'; owiskra, 'hail', 'sleet'; gawiskeron-tion, gawison-tion, 'one is casting or sowing hail, ice, sleet', hence 'one (it) is hailing'; lastly, watiowiskwentare, meaning 'it has covered it with frost, with ice'; 'it has spread out ice (like a sheet)'; hence 'it has covered it with glare ice.' In the two sentence-words preceding the last one cited, the final -ontion is the perfect tense form of the irregular verb -off, 'cast', 'throw', but it has a present meaning, 'is casting, throwing'. The termination of the last citation, -kwentare, is a perfect tense form with the meaning of a present tense, viz, 'is lying flat', 'is lying face downward'. The original meaning of the nominal stem -wiskâr- of the vocable owiskârâ was apparently 'crystal', 'smooth', 'slippery', 'slick'; hence it came to designate ice on the one hand, and chert or flint on the other. Even among the Cherokee, who are linguistically cognate with the Iroquoian peoples of the E. and N., Tâwi'skâlâ is the name of a mythic anthropic being, called Flint, regarded as the producer of flint rock. They have also preserved in the words tâwi'ska or tâwi'skage, signifying 'smooth', 'slick', the fundamental meaning the stem had before it came to denote 'flint'. Thus Cherokee usage confirms the suggestion that the basic signification of the stem -wiskar-, or -wiskër-, is 'smooth', 'crystal', 'slippery', 'slick'. A similar connection between terms denotive of 'ice' and 'flint' respectively, exists among some of the Algonquian dialects, and also between these terms and the name for 'wolf', a false connection has been established in some of these same dialects. In Passamaquoddy and Malecite malsum and malsumsis signify 'wolf' and 'small wolf' respectively, while the first is also a name of this younger brother of Nanabozho (Kuloskop); and in the closely related Micmac, mâls signifies 'flint' or 'chert'. The last is found in Unami Delaware under the form mâhales, and in the Unalachtigo Delaware of Campanius Holm under that of mahâres, with the signification 'flint', 'chert'. But in the Abnaki it appears under the form monlsem, with the meaning 'wolf'. In the Chippewa name for 'white flint', mikwame-wabik, literally 'ice stone' or 'ice rock', is brought out the reason for the use of the same vocable to denote 'ice', 'frost', 'sleet', on the one hand, and 'chert', 'flint', on the other. The Chippewa term for ice is mikwam, and the Cree miskwamiy, whence the derivative miskwamissa, 'it hails'. Piponoukhe (written Kabebonica by Schoolcraft) signifies freely 'Winter Maker', from pipon, 'winter', and the verb-stem -oke or -okhe, 'make, cause, do'; and Chakekenapok means 'the Man of Flint, or the Fire-stone'. In the foregoing identifications are found the reasons that gave the name 'He is the Flint', 'He Overspreads with Ice', 'He is the Ice', 'He is the Winter-maker', and lastly, 'He is the Wolf', to one and the same personage identified with the production and control of certain phenomena in nature. It has thus become evident that through wrong interpretations of misunderstood homophonic but not cognate terms, various striking appellations, suggested by more or less apparent similarity between the unrelated natural phenomena in question, have been made the name of the imaginary man-being, originally believed to produce and control but one class of phenomena. Brinton (Myths of the New World, 203, 1896) endeavored to show that the name Tawiskara was a cognate or derivative of the Oneida tetiucalas, and the Mohawk tyokaras or tewhgarlas, which he rendered 'dark or darkness' (although they in fact all mean 'at the time it becomes dark, at twilight'), and he purported to quote Bruyas and Cuoq in support of this opinion, although neither of these lexicographers, so far as known, attempted to analyze the name Tawiskaron or Tawiskara).

An imaginary man-being of the cosmogonic philosophy of the Iroquoian and other tribes, to whom was attributed the function of making and controlling the activities and phenomena of winter. He was the Winter God, the Ice King, since his distinctive character is clearly defined in terms of the activities and phenomena of nature peculiar to this season. As an earth power he was one of the great primal man-beings belonging to the second cosmical period of the mythological philosophy of the Iroquoian, Algonquian, and perhaps other Indians. Although his paternity was not beyond question, his parentage was illustrious. In the mythology to which he belonged, his grandmother, Auên'hâi ('Mature Flower', or probably 'Mature Earth'), called Mesakomikokwi by the Potawatomi, was expelled from the skyland, situated above the visible firmament, because of her husband's jealousy. When in falling she reached the waters of the primal sea that covered the space now occupied by the earth she was received on the carapace of the great primal Turtle who belonged to this second cosmic period, on which his fellows had prepared the nucleus of the earth. Being parthenogenetically pregnant before her expulsion, she in due time gave birth to a daughter, who, on reaching woman's estate, became pregnant while at play, according to one of several differing traditions, by the direct act of the primal man-being called Wind. In due time the young woman gave birth to twins (some traditions say to quadruplets), one being Te'haroⁿ'hiawä'k'hoⁿ (q. v.), the other Tawi'skaroⁿ. The latter destroyed his mother by refusing to be born in the natural way and in violently emerging through his mother's armpit—some traditions say through her navel. This he was readily fitted to do because his body was composed of chert or flint and his head was in the form of an arrowpoint of flint. According to a variant version, one of the great race of the Turtle, transformed into a handsome young warrior, sought the maiden for his wife. Having refused many other man-beings under the same guise by the advice of her mother, she at last, through the counsel of the same mentor, accepted him. Having come to her lodge on the appointed night, he conversed with her until the time came for retiring, when the young warrior placed two arrows, one plain and the other tipped with flint, horizontally in the bark side of the lodge just above the maiden, and then departed. The next day he returned for a short time, and then taking his arrows withdrew. In due time the twins were born, as related above. It is believed that Tawi'skaroⁿ, in the substance of his body and in the shape of his head, was prenataally suggested by the flint-tipped arrow. In concept Tawi'skaroⁿ is so closely identical with the mythic personage called Chakekenapok in Algonquian mythology, a younger brother of Nanabozho, that they may be treated together.

In Iroquoian mythology this being is known under various names indicative of some function or feature attributed to him. Among his Iroquoian names are Tawis'karon (Te'hawis'karroⁿ), Tawis'kano or Tawiskarano', Saiewiskerat, Tawiskara, O'hä'ä' ('Flint,' Onondaga), Ot'hä'gwěⁿ'dä' ('Flint,' Seneca), Tehotennhiaron ('He is arrayed in flint,' Mohawk), Atenenhiarhon (a corrupt form of the last), of which the Tuscarora form is Tuněñya'r'hěⁿ, meaning 'a giant' only, Ro'nikofrahēt'kěⁿ ('His Mind is Evil'), and Honoⁿ'hi'däe', ('He is Warty', Seneca).

Malsum, Piponoukhe', Chakekenapok, and Windigo. In one of the earliest accounts of Algonquian cosmical myths it is said that the Montagnais attributed the change of seasons to two brothers—Nipinoukhe ('Summer-maker') and Piponoukhe ('Winter-maker'). Most of these Indians regarded these brothers as human in form, while the rest were not so certain on this point; all, however, were agreed that they were beings who were alive like themselves, for they had been overheard talking and rustling, especially at their return, although no one understood their language. Far in the north dwelt Piponoukhe for a stated time, while his brother lived in the sunny southland. At regular times the two brothers exchanged places, which brought about a change of seasons. The Montagnais called this exchanging of places Achitescatoueth. Piponoukhe brought with him cold weather, frost, snow, sleet, and ice, and thereby destroyed everything. This myth has been developed into that of Kulpojut, explained below.

The persistence and the security of life from the destructive powers of the Winter god is metaphorically expressed in the details of the following incident related in one of the longer versions of the common Iroquoian genesis myth. During the creative time Te'haroⁿ'hiawä'k'hoⁿ received from his father of the race of the Turtle an ear of corn, with proper instructions as to its care and uses. In time Te'haroⁿ'hiawä'k'hoⁿ roasted an ear of corn which he had himself raised, which emitted an appetizing aroma. When Tawis'karoⁿ smelt this odor he informed his grandmother, who ordered him to go to the lodge of his brother to ask him to share this unknown thing with them. On hearing this request Te'haroⁿ'hiawä'k'hoⁿ replied that he would consent on condition that Tawis'karoⁿ surrender to him "the flint whereby thou livest." To this Flint replied, "What dost thou mean? Dost thou mean my arrow with the point of flint?" To which the reply came, "No; I mean, indeed, that flint which is in thy body." To this Flint answered, "So be it as thou dost wish it." Then, opening his mouth, he thrust out the flint thing in question. His brother seized it and gently pulled it; he would not break it off, although Flint asked him to do so. "Verily," his brother answered, "thy life belongs to thee, so thou thyself must break it off and give it to me, for on no other condition can our compact be fulfilled." So, reluctantly, Flint performed his part of the agreement, whereupon his brother gave him two grains of the corn, one for the grandmother and one for himself. By this act Tawis'karoⁿ lost his birthright of coequal orenda (q. v.), or magic power. This is readily explainable by the phenomena of the beginning of the spring of the year. By the internal heat of the earth, icicles thaw and become detached at their bases and are not broken off within their length; and on clear mornings the face of nature is sometimes covered with heavy hoarfrost which by the internal warmth of things and a slight rise in the temperature of the air becomes detached without melting from the outside, as it were, but falls like flakes of snow. These phenomena show that the power of the Winter god is ending, and that Tawis'karoⁿ surrenders again his flint lance—the piercing, blasting, withering power of frost and winter's cold.

In the cosmical legends of the Iroquoian tribes, Tawis'karoⁿ, incited and abetted by his grandmother, makes many attempts to thwart his brother, Te'haroⁿ-hiawä'k'hoⁿ, in his work of bringing into orderly being the present phenomena and bodies of nature. One of the most exciting of these efforts was the theft of the sun by Tawis'karoⁿ, and Awëⁿ-hā'i, his grandmother. They carried it far away to the southeast, where they hoped to keep it solely for their own use. But by the potent aid of the magic power of various great man-beings, such as Otter, Beaver, Fox, and Fisher, Te'haroⁿ-hiawä'k'hoⁿ was enabled to recapture the sun and to bring it back and then to place it where it now is shining for all people. It is hardly necessary to point out that this incident is the mythologic statement of the fact that in the autumn and winter the sun apparently goes far to the southeast.

Tawis'karoⁿ, in emulation of his brother's successful attempts to create various things, made only noxious objects, such as bats, butterflies, owls, frogs, and worms and other creeping things; but his first great labor was to conceal from Te'haroⁿ-hiawä'k'hoⁿ all the birds and animals in a great cavern in a cliff; this is evidently but a metaphorical statement of the driving of the birds to migration and of the animals to hibernate by the approach of Winter. According to the legend they were in great part freed by Te'haroⁿ-hiawä'k'hoⁿ. Then Tawis'karoⁿ is discovered by his brother, constructing a bridge of white rocks (i. e., ice) on the surface of the surrounding waters, which he asserted he was gradually extending toward the distant shore of another land wherein dwelt fierce, carnivorous monsters, in order to enable them to come across to feed upon the people and the animals created by Te'haroⁿ-hiawä'k'hoⁿ; this was obviously the statement that were all lakes and rivers bridged solidly with ice, the monsters Cold, Want, Famine, and Death would readily cross and feed on the creatures of his brother, for nothing is killed except for food by the great primal beings. He was stopped in this nefarious work by his brother, who sent the tufted bluebird, with the bloody thigh of a grasshopper in its mouth, to frighten him by its cry. As this bird is one of the first heralds of spring, its cry told Winter that Spring was at hand, and so Tawis'karoⁿ fled with his work only half finished. The bridge of white flint dissolved as fast as he fled to the land. When he became the prisoner of his own brother he attempted to escape on one of the pieces of white flint. It is only a step from a cake of ice to the mythical "white stone canoe," so popular and yet so erroneously attributed to various other beings. Again, he tries to imitate his brother in creating a human being, which was the object of his greatest desire; so having learned from his brother that life was immanent in the substance of the earth, and therefore the products of it, Tawis'karoⁿ decided to outdo him by using the foam of water to form his man-being, as in fact it was; after thus forming the body of the man-being he called his brother to see it, but failing to cause it to show any signs of life, he implored his brother to aid him by giving it life and motion, which was done. As this man-being was pure white it is obvious that this creature was snow, and that without life, which Tawis'karoⁿ could not give it, it could not come and go, as it does, like that which has life and power of motion. Some modern Iroquois who are the adherents of the so-called Handsome Lake reformed Iroquois religion, and others who have become converted to Christianity claim to identify Tawis'karoⁿ with the devil of Caucasians, and so reasoning from this incident pretend that this devil created the white race. The constant antagonism between Tawis'karoⁿ and his twin brother finally caused the latter to decide upon the destruction of his younger brother. In the details of the fierce combat with unequal weapons to which this resolution led, it is said that the surface of the earth was crumpled into ridges and valleys, that the blood and the fragments from the body of Tawis'karoⁿ became flint stones, and that from his intestines were formed fruitful vines of many kinds—a statement obviously due to the fact that vines growing in the clefts of rocks apparently barren have a peculiar luxuriance.

In the Cherokee story of the Rabbit and Tawiskälä (Mooney, 19th Rep. B. A. E., 1900) the ceaseless struggle between life, the productive force in nature, represented by the Rabbit, and the destructive powers of nature, represented by Tawiskälä, are quite apparent. The Rabbit in this story is evidently the Algonquian Wabozho ('White Maker') who has been absorbed into the Nanabozho character as explained below. The story relates that Rabbit, while Tawiskälä was in his lodge, drove a sharp stake into the body of his guest, causing it to explode, scattering flint fragments in all directions.

In one of the variants of the common Iroquoian cosmic genesis myth Tawis'karoⁿ is one of four children, quadruplets, of whom the name of only one, Te'haroⁿ-hiawä'k'hoⁿ, has been recorded. In the Potawatomi version of the Algonquian cycle of genesis myths, however, the Algonquian names of these quadruplets have been preserved by Father De Smet. These latter names are Nanabozho (q. v.), Chipiapoos (?Tcapiapozho), Wabosso (?Wabozho, 'White maker'), and Chakekenapok (Cree Tchakisahigan, 'flint', 'gun-flint', etc.). The infant man-being bearing the last name caused the death of his mother by violently bursting through her side.

In after time some of the functions of Wabozho were evidently absorbed in part by Chakekenapok or attributed to him, either consciously or unconsciously, thus leaving only two great personages or man-beings, for Tcapiapozho while he lived was a rather negative character, largely dominated by Nanabozho, who also appears to have absorbed the name Wabozho and a part of his functions. Thus in the third great cosmic period, the present, a complete parallelism became established between the elemental gods of the Iroquoian and the Algonquian pantheon. For this period the Iroquoian data are more complete and definite. The gods have departed from the earth and have their dwelling in the skyland, the land of disembodied souls. According to the Iroquoian legends descriptive of this skyland, there is far in the rear of the great lodge of Awëⁿ-hā'i, the grandmother of Tawis'karoⁿ, a large compartment in which dwells a man-being of peculiar aspect and functions. His name in the Onondaga dialect is De'hodiätgä'-ewëⁿ, 'He whose body is divided or split in two parts.' One of these parts, it is said, is crystal ice, and the other is warm flesh and blood. Twice every year this man-being, whose magic power outranks all earth-produced ones, comes to the doorway of his compartment, presenting in each instance a different side of his body. When he presents the side composed of crystalline ice, winter begins on the earth; and when he presents the side constituted of flesh and blood, summer begins. He is evidently composed of the characters in large measure of Tawis'karoⁿ and Te'haroⁿ-hiawä'k'hoⁿ, of the Iroquoian cosmology, and of Piponoukhe and Nipinoukhe, or Nanabozho and Chakekenapok, of the Algonquian cosmical legends; for in them is found a great man-being whose functions are concerned with the change of seasons. His name in Passamaquoddy is Kulpojut (Coolpūjōt in Micmac by Rand), which signifies 'One rolled over by handspikes.' Each spring and each autumn he is rolled over; he faces the w. for the autumn season, and the e. for the spring. His body, it is said, has no bones. In this lodge of Awëⁿ-hā'i and in the skyland Te'haroⁿ-hiawä'k'hoⁿ has become only a shadowy figure, a mere messenger or inspector for the gods. Tawis'karoⁿ has been completely absorbed in the great man-being of ice and flesh, De'hodiät'-kāewëⁿ. Such appears to be the degree of development of the two great dominating figures in the cosmological philosophy of the Iroquoian and the Algonquian peoples. See Mythology, Nanabozho, Te'haronhiawagon.

Tawkee. (1) The golden-club or floating arum (Orontium aquaticum). (2) The Virginia wake-robin (Arum virginicum). The word, formerly in use in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and still surviving locally, was adopted in the 17th century by the Swedish settlers in New Jersey. Rev. A. Hesselius (1725) speaks of "tachis or hopnuts" (Nelson, Inds. of N. J., 78, 1894). Kalm (Trav., I, 389, 1772) cites as Indian names of Arum virginicum tawks, tawking, and tuckah, adding that the Swedes of New Jersey call it tawko. Kalm also cites as names of the golden-club tawkim, tuckoim, etc., stating also that the Swedes call it tawkee. The word, which is practically the same as tuckahoe, is derived from p'tukwi, or p'tukqueu, in the Delaware dialect of Algonquian, signifying 'it is globular,' a term of general application to tuberous roots. (A. F. C.)

Tawsee. A Cherokee settlement about the period of the Revolution; situated on Tugaloo r., in the present Habersham co., N. E. Ga.

Tahasse.—Bartram Trav., 371, 1792. Torse.—Doc. of 1755 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 143, 1887. Tusse.—Muzon's map (1771) cited by Royce, ibid.

Tashtyë' +.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., ix, 849, 1896 (+ = ash = 'people').

Taxlipu. Given as a Chumashan village formerly near Santa Barbara, Cal. (Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 459, 1874). Possibly intended for Tashlibunau, the Yokuts name of a place near San Emidio, at the s. extremity of Tulare valley, in Chumash territory. (A. L. K.)

Tazaigadika ('salmon eaters'). A Shoshoni division formerly occupying the country about Salmon falls on Snake r., s. Idaho. Their dependence on the salmon which abounded here gave them their name of "Salmon Eaters."

Ag'-gi-tik'-kah.—Stuart, Montana, 81, 1865. Fish Eaters.—Ross, Fur Hunters, i, 249, 1855. Salmon Eaters.—Stuart, op. cit., 81. Táza'aigadi'ka.—Hoffman in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., xxiii, 298, 1886. War-are-ree-kas.—Ross, op. cit.

Tastasagonies. A tribe referred to in 1730 as living northward from San Antonio, Texas, and as being hostile to the tribes of the San Antonio region (Pedro de Rivera, doc. in Arch. Col. Santa Cruz de Querétaro, K, leg. 5, no. 6). About this time the governor of Texas, Mediavilla y Ascona, asked permission to make war on the "Apache, Yita [Yuta, Ute] and Tastasagonia" (ibid., K, leg. 6, no. 15). The tribe is therefore probably one otherwise known under the name of Apache or Comanche. (H. E. B.)

Tastasagonia.—Mediavilla y Ascona (1746), op. cit.

Tchachagoulas. A name noted on De l'Isle's map of 1707 as that of a town or people on Bayou Lafourche, s. e. La., below Bayougoula. The name contains the Mobilian term okla, 'people', but the first part cannot be translated.

Tchachagoulas.—French, Hist. Coll. La., iii, 59, note, 1851. Tchatchagoula.—De l'Isle map (1707) in Winsor, Hist. Am., ii, 294, 1886.

Tchanhié. An unidentified village or tribe mentioned to Joutel in 1687 (Margry, Déc., iii, 409, 1878), while he was staying with the Kadohadacho on Red r. of Louisiana, by the chief of that tribe, as being among his enemies.

Tchataksofka ('precipice'). A town of the Creek Nation, 1 m. s. of Eufaula, Okla.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., ii, 186, 1888.

Tchatchian ('raccoon'). A Yuchi clan. Djá'tie.—Speck, Yuchi Inds., 70, 1909. Tchâto'hium tahá.—Gatschet, Uchee MS., B. A. E., 70, 1885 (= 'raccoon gens').

Tchâti Kutŋgi nâmu.—Gatschet in Trans. Anthr. Soc. Wash., ii, 152, 1883.

Teéti nâmu.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1909. Tchéti nâmu.—Gatschet in Trans. Anthr. Soc. Wash., ii, 152, 1883 (nâmu = 'village').

Tchikilli. See Chekilli.

Tchikimisi (Tcikimisi). A former Maidu village on the s. side of Cosumnes r., not far from the mouth of Camp cr., Eldorado co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, map, 1905.

Te (T'ê). A Haida town, the principal one owned by the Tas-lanas before they migrated to Alaska. It formerly stood on the w. coast of Graham id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., opposite Frederick id. (J. R. S.)

Ti Inigé.—Harrison in Proc. Roy. Soc. Can., ser. ii, 124, 1895. T'ê.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Te. The Cottonwood clans of the Tewa pueblos of San Juan, Santa Clara, and San Ildefonso, N. Mex.

Te-tdôa.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., ix, 850, 1896 (tdôa = 'people').

Teacuacueitzisti. A dialect of the Cora language, spoken, according to Ortega, by that part of the tribe living in the lower parts of the Sierra Nayarit, toward the w., in Jalisco, Mexico. The name with the termination isti or izti was for a time applied to a division of the Cora proper, but the dialectal variation being slight, this classification has been abandoned. See Cora.

Teacuacitzica.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 59, 1864.

Teakuacitzisti.—Pimentel, Leng. de Mex., ii, 83, 1865.

Teahinkutchin ('people of the lower country'). A Kutchin tribe or a subdivision of the Natsitkutchin formerly inhabiting the country n. w. of the latter. They hunted the caribou from the Yukon to the coast of the Arctic ocean. They formerly were a strong band, but by 1866 were reduced to only 4 hunters, and now are probably extinct.

Gens de siffleur.—Ross, notes on Tinne, S. I. MS. 474 ('marmot people'). Tê-â-hiâ'kutch'In.—Ibid. (trans. 'people of the country below others'). Te-ha-hin Kutchin.—Gibbs, MS. notes on Ross, B. A. E. Teytssekutahi.—Latham in Trans. Philol. Soc. Lond., 67, 1856.

Teahquois. A Nanticoke village in 1707, probably on the lower Susquehanna r., Pa.—Evans (1707) quoted by Day, Pa., 391, 1843.

Teakata (te-aka, a sort of underground cooking pit, hence 'the place where there is the teaka' par excellence). The most sacred place of the Huichol, containing a small temple and 7 "god houses," which give it the effect of a little village; situated near Santa Catarina, Jalisco, Mexico. The principal god of the Huichol was the one who cooks the food dearest to the tribe—deer meat and mesquite hearts—in a teaka, whence the name of the place. Near by is a large shallow cavern called Hainótega, the birthplace and first home of the Huichol God of Fire.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mexico, ii, 169, 1902.

Teana. A tribe mentioned in 1708 in a list of those that had been met or heard of N. of San Juan Bautista mission on the lower Rio Grande (Fr. Isidro Felix de Espinosa, Relación Compendiosa of the Rio Grande missions, MS. in the College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro). (H. E. B.)

Teanaustayae. One of the most important Huron villages formerly in Ontario. In 1638 the mission of St Joseph was removed there from Ihontiria. It was destroyed by the Iroquois in 1648.

Ieanaustaiiae.—Jes. Rel. 1637, 107, 1858 (misprint). St Joseph.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 178, 1855. Teanaustayae.—Ibid., 174. Teanaustaiixé.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 63, 1858 (misprint). Teanaustaiiae.—Ibid., 1637, 107, 1858. Teanaustaiái.—Ibid., 161. Teanaustái.—Ibid., 70.

Teatontaloga ('two mountains apart'). A Mohawk village existing at different periods in New York. The oldest one known by that name was the principal village of the tribe until destroyed by the French in 1666. It was rebuilt a mile above the former site and was for a time the site of the Jesuit mission of St Mary, but was again destroyed by the French in 1693. Both villages were on the N. side of Mohawk r., close to water, and probably near the mouth of Schoharie cr., in Montgomery co., N. Y. On this spot, on the W. side of the creek, was the last village of that name, better known in the 18th century as the Lower Mohawk Castle. It was also called Icanderago. Macauley applies this name to the Mohawk band in the vicinity of the village. (J. N. B. H.)

Icanderago.—Macauley, N. Y., II, 96, 1829. Icander-a-goes.—Ibid., 174-5, 1829 (the band). Lower Mohawk Castle.—Morgan, League Iroq., 474, 1851. Saint Mary.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 258, 1855 (mission name). Ogsadago.—Hansen (1700) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Tebi (Te'-bi). The Greasewood clan of the Pakab (Reed) phratry of the Hopi.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891.

Tebityilat. A former village connected with San Carlos mission, Cal., and said to have been occupied by the Esselen.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Tebugkihu ('fire house'). A large oval ruin, the walls of which are still standing 5 to 8 ft high; situated 15 m. N. E. of Keam's cañon and about 25 m. from Walpi, N. E. Ariz. The pueblo was constructed in prehistoric times by the now extinct Firewood clan of the Hopi, ancestors of the inhabitants of the ancient pueblo of Sikyatki.

Fire-house.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 20, 1891. Tebugkihu.—Mindeleff, ibid., 57. Tebuñki.—Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 633, 1898. Tebwúki.—Stephen, op. cit.

Mex., in 1598.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871.

Tecahuistes. A former tribe, probably Coahuiltecan, found on the road from Coahuila to the Texas country in 1690.—Massanet (1690) in Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, MS.

Tecamamionen (native name of Rainy lake). A Chippewa band living on Rainy lake, Minn., numbering 500 in 1736. Cf. Kojejewinineuug.

Tecamamionen.—Chauvignerie (1736) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IX, 1054, 1855.

Tecargoni. Mentioned by Orozco y Berra (Geog., 58, 1864) as a division of the Varohio in W. Chihuahua, Mexico, apparently in Chinipas valley.

Tecarnohs ('oozing oil.'—Hewitt). A Seneca settlement, commonly known as Oil Spring village, formerly on Oil cr., near Cuba, Cattaraugus co., N. Y.

Oil Spring.—Morgan, League Iroq., 466, 1851. Tecar'-nohs.—Ibid.

Techicodeguachi. A pueblo, probably of the Opata, in Sonora, Mexico, in 1688. It was a visita of the Spanish mission of Guazavas (q. v.), and was situated in the vicinity thereof, on Rio Batepipo. Pop. 90 at the date named.

Sta Gertrudis Techicodeguachi.—Doc. of 1688 quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 246, 1884.

Techirogen ('at the fork of the stream.'—Hewitt). An Iroquois village N. of Oneida lake, N. Y., in the middle of the 18th century.—Bellin's map, 1755.

Tecolom. A former village, probably Salinan, connected with San Antonio mission, Monterey co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 27, 1860.

Tecolote (from Aztec tecolotl, the ground owl). A Papago village in S. W. Pima co., Ariz., near the Mexican border, with 140 families in 1865.

Del Tecolote.—Bailey in Ind. Aff. Rep., 208, 1858. Tecolota.—Poston, ibid., 1863, 385, 1864. Tecolote.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 19, 1863.

Tecoripa. A pueblo of the Nevome and formerly the seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1619; situated in central Sonora, Mexico, on the W. branch of lower Rio Yaqui, lat. 29°, lon. 110° 30'. Pop. 269 in 1678; 50 in 1730. Its inhabitants, called by the same name, probably spoke a dialect slightly different from Nevome proper.

Tecorino.—Kino, map (1702) in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott., 74, 1726. Tecoripa.—Rivera (1730) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 513, 1884. San Francisco de Borja de Tecoripa.—Zapata (1678) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., III, 358, 1857.

Tecualme. A division of the Cora proper in the Sierra de Nayarit, Jalisco, Mexico. They spoke the same dialect as the Cora. According to Alegre (Hist. Comp. Jesus, III, 205, 1842) they were the last of the three tribes of the Nayarit mts. to yield to the missionaries in the 18th century, when they were placed in pueblos along the Rio San Pedro. One of their former villages was Tonalizco.

Geenalme.—Ortiz y Berra, Geog., 240, 1461 (misprint). Jecualme.—Mota Padilla misquoted, ibid., 277. Tecualme.—Mota Padilla (1742), Conq. Nueva Galicia, 21, 1872.

Tecumigishik. See Tikumigizluk.

Tecumseh (properly Tikumthi or Tecumtha: 'One who passes across intervening space from one point to another,' i. e. springs (Jones); the name indicates that the owner belongs to the gens of the Great Medicine Panther, or Meteor, hence the interpretations 'Crouching Panther' and 'Shooting Star'). A celebrated Shawnee chief, born in 1768 at the Shawnee village of Piqua on Mad r., about 6 m. s. w. of the present Springfield, Ohio. It was destroyed by the Kentuckians in 1780. His father, who was also a chief, was killed at the battle of Point Pleasant in 1774 (see Cornstalk). His mother is said to have been by birth a Creek, but this is doubtful. It must be remembered that a considerable body of Shawnee were domiciliated among the Creeks until long after the Revolution. On the death of his father, Tecumseh was placed under the care of an elder brother, who in turn was killed in battle with the whites on the Tennessee frontier in 1788 or 1789. Still another brother was killed by Tecumseh's side at Wayne's victory in 1794. While still a young man Tecumseh distinguished himself in the border wars of the period, but was noted also for his humane character, evinced by persuading his tribe to discontinue the practice of torturing prisoners. Together with his brother Tenskwatawa the Prophet (q. v.), he was an ardent opponent of the advance of the white man, and denied the right of the Government to make land purchases from any single tribe, on the ground that the territory, especially in the Ohio valley country, belonged to all the tribes in common. On the refusal of the Government to recognize this principle, he undertook the formation of a great confederacy of all the western and southern tribes for the purpose of holding the Ohio r. as the permanent boundary between the two races. In pursuance of this object he or his agents visited every tribe from Florida to the head of the Missouri r. While Tecumseh was organizing the work in the S. his plans were brought to disastrous overthrow by the premature battle of Tippecanoe under the direction of the Prophet, Nov. 7, 1811. On the breaking out of the War of 1812, Tecumseh at once led his forces to the support of the British, and was rewarded with a regular commission as brigadier-general, having under his command some 2,000 warriors of the allied tribes. He fought at Frenchtown, The Raisin, Ft Meigs, and Ft Stephenson, and covered Proctor's retreat after Perry's decisive victory on L. Erie, until, declining to retreat farther, he compelled Proctor to make a stand on Thames r., near the present Chatham, Ont. In the bloody battle which ensued the allied British and Indians were completely defeated by Harrison, Tecumseh himself falling in the front of his warriors, Oct. 5, 1813, being then in his 45th year. With a presentiment of death he had discarded his general's uniform before the battle and dressed himself in his Indian deer-skin. He left one son, the father of Wapamcepto, alias Big Jim (q. v.). From all that is said of Tecumseh in contemporary record, there is no reason to doubt the verdict of Trumbull that he was the most extraordinary Indian character in United States history. There is no true portrait of him in existence, the one commonly given as such in Loessing's War of 1812 (1875) and reproduced in Appleton's Cyclopedia of American Biography (1894), and Mooney's Ghost Dance (1896), being a composite result based on a pencil sketch made about 1812, on which were mounted his cap, medal, and uniform. Tedyuskung (possibly a variant of Kekuskung, or Kikeunkund, of the Munsee dialect, which signifies 'the healer,' 'one who cures wounds, bruises, etc.'—Hewitt). One of the most famous and crafty of the Delaware chiefs during the period of discussion of the Indian claims following the sale of the lands along the Delaware and Susquehanna to the Proprietors of Pennsylvania by the Iroquois. He was born at Trenton, N. J., about 1705, and died Apr. 16, 1763. Nothing is known of his life before the time he first appears as a historic character, prior to which he was known as "Honest John." When about 50 years of age he was chosen as the chief of the Delawares on the Susquehanna, and from that time until his death he was one of the chief figures in the problem which the authorities of Pennsylvania were trying to solve. He occupied a peculiar position. Sir William Johnson, of New York, was a zealous friend of the Iroquois; Conrad Weiser and George Croghan, of Pennsylvania, were also strongly prejudiced against the Delawares and Shawnee. The question which the government of the province of Pennsylvania had to answer was, How to keep peace with the Iroquois and at the same time prevent the Delawares and the Shawnee, who were becoming more independent of the Iroquois, from going over to the French. The Delawares were beginning to feel that they had been unjustly deprived of their lands by the Pennsylvania authorities aided by the Iroquois. They had been driven from the Delaware to the Susquehanna, and many of them had been forced from that later refuge to the Ohio; and now that France and England had commenced to struggle for the possession of that region they felt that they were being driven from their last resort. They were revolting not only against the English but also against their masters, the Iroquois. At this critical time, when the border settlements in western Pennsylvania were being ravaged by hostile bands of Delawares and Shawnee, and when the English were making preparations for an expedition for the purpose of taking Ft Duquesne, Tedyuskung took his stand as a friend of the English and as a patriot of the Delawares and the Shawnee. The mission of Christian F. Post to the Ohio Indians, at Kuskuski, and its success, and the termination of French rule on the Ohio, were in large measure due to the influence and the efforts of this Delaware chief.

Conrad Weiser had told the story of the western Indians at the council at Albany (1754) in order that the Iroquois might know the real situation. The chiefs of the Six Nations realized that something must be done concerning their complaints about the squatters on the Juniata (Col. Rec. Pa., vi, 84, 1851).

At this conference Weiser found that several agents from Connecticut were present, who were seeking to bargain with the Mohawk for land in the Wyoming valley. Before the conference was over these agents went away with deeds for the eastern part of the Wyoming valley and the East branch of the Susquehanna. The Indians went home to the Ohio to find out that the West branch had been sold to Pennsylvania. These facts, and the defeat of Washington at Ft Necessity, followed by Braddock's defeat, led to three years of bloodshed and vengeance. The sale of their lands at Albany, the traffic in rum along the Ohio, and the total neglect by the province of Pennsylvania, caused a complete alienation of these western Indians. Then began the various attempts to win them back, which caused almost endless discussion between the governor, the assembly, and the Proprietors (Col. Rec. Pa., vi, 683; vii, 85, et seq., 1851). The passing of the Scalp Act and the declaration of war against the Delawares caused this tribe to rise in rebellion against the province, and also against longer wearing the hated title of "women" (ibid., vii, 522, 1851). Such was the situation when the council was called at Easton, July, 1756, at which Tedyuskung appeared as the champion of the Delawares. The governor of Pennsylvania opened the council with a speech in which he welcomed the chief. Tedyuskung in his reply said: "The Delawares are no longer the slaves of the Six Nations. I, Tedyuskung, have been appointed king over the Five United Nations. What I do here will be approved by all. This is a good day. I wish the same good that possessed the good old man William Penn, who was the friend of the Indian, may inspire the people of the province at this time" (ibid., 213). A grand reception and feast were given to the Indians present, and "the king and Newcastle" were sent to give the "big peace halloo" to the Indians and invite them to a large conference, which would be held later. Tedyuskung left Easton, but remained at Ft Allen, where his drunken sprees and the actions of Lieut. Miller endangered the whole outcome of the peace negotiations. (For the letters from Ft Allen concerning Tedyuskung and the investigation of affairs by Weiser, see Frontier Forts of Pa., i, 202, 1896, and Archives of Pa., 2d s., ii, 745, 1853.)

It was at this time that Tedyuskung was blamed for having dealings with the French. There is no evidence that such was the case. While he was lingering at Ft Allen the governor of Pennsylvania sent Newcastle to New York to find out from the Iroquois if they had deputized Tedyuskung to act for them. This they denied.

War between France and England had been declared and the expedition against Ft Duquesne was being organized. An alliance with the Cherokee and the Catawba was being sought. The Iroquois and the Delawares both said that they would not fight on the same side with these hated foes, hence the whole effect of the Easton council was in danger of becoming dissipated. Then came up the almost endless discussions among the various parties in the councils of the province. Gov: Morris had been succeeded by Gov: Denny, who insisted that the council for which arrangements had been made must be held in Philadelphia and not at Easton. Finally he consented to go to Easton with a heavy guard. Tedyuskung said in his opening speech: "I am sorry for what our people have done. I have gone among our people pleading for peace. If it cost me my life I would do it" (Col. Rec. Pa., VII, 332, 1851).

A general peace was decided upon, and Tedyuskung promised to see that the white prisoners were returned. He went to Ft Allen, where he and his warriors had a drunken frolic. Weiser says of him at this time: "Though he is a drunkard and a very irregular man, yet he is a man that can think well, and I believe him to be sincere in what he said" (Pa. Arch. 2d s., III, 67, 1853). When the council opened at Easton in July (1757), Tedyuskung demanded that he have a clerk of his own. This request caused much discussion, but was finally granted upon Tedyuskung's threat to leave if it was not acceded to (Pa. Arch., 2d s., III, 259 et seq., 1853). Richard Peters was angered at the position taken by the assembly and the commissioners that Tedyuskung's demands for a clerk were right. He was also much provoked by the way the business was carried on, charging Conrad Weiser, George Crogan, and others with trying to unfit "the king" for the transaction of business by getting him drunk every night. But whatever may have been the intentions of the Pennsylvania representatives, the "king" went to the councils each day with a clear head and perfectly able to cope with all of the representatives of the province of Pennsylvania. The principal point at issue concerned the fraud in the land grants (see Walton, Conrad Weiser, 356, 1900). After first refusing to allow Tedyuskung to see the deeds of these sales, as he had requested at the previous council, the governor and the council finally granted his request and permitted him to see the deeds of 1686 and 1737 from the Delawares and that of 1749 from the Iroquois. By request of the chief these deeds were copied for him by Charles Thompson. After a promise that satisfaction should be made for the fraudulent "Walking Purchase," if any fraud was found, peace with the Delawares seemed assured. In order to make it more complete it was deemed necessary to bring the Indians on the Ohio into friendly relations.

In the spring of 1758 Tedyuskung went to Philadelphia and after a conference with the governor and council he urged them to complete the work of peace by bringing these western Indians into friendly relations at once. This was the first suggestion of an official mission to the Indians on the Ohio, which later resulted in Post's journey to Kuskuski. The council did not take action promptly, so Tedyuskung decided to send two members of his own tribe on the errand of peace; but these messengers did not get beyond Ft Allen. A new difficulty had arisen. Paxinos, the friendly Shawnee chief, had turned against the English, and a general Indian uprising was threatened. When the cause of this was searched for, it was found that both the Iroquois and the Delawares were becoming aroused because of the presence of their hated enemies, the Cherokee and the Catawba, with Gen. Forbes' expedition. Both the general and the governor urged Post and Thompson to go to Wyoming to try to win back the dissatisfied Indians. On their way to Wyoming they met Tedyuskung, who insisted on their going back, as to go on was to endanger their lives. They followed his advice, but on their return to the governor they were immediately sent back to the old chief with offers of peace from the Cherokee deputies. After Tedyuskung had heard this message, and had heard also from the western Indians as to the condition of affairs on the Ohio, he insisted that messengers be sent westward at once. On Post's return and report to the governor he was despatched at once to the Ohio. This mission of the Moravian missionary to the western Indians was one of the most heroic enterprises ever undertaken by any man. The miles of forests were filled with hostile Indians who knew nothing of these peace proposals; the French were doing everything to keep the angered Indians in alliance with them; the winter was fast approaching, and before such a journey could be made the mountains would be covered deep with snow. Post and his work at this critical time have never been justly appreciated. His own unbounded faith and his efforts to win the western Indians prevented defeat similar to that of Braddock.

ward. All the various land disputes came before the council (Walton, Conrad Weiser, 372, 1900).

The one particular dispute with which Tedyuskung had to do was that of the Walking Purchase, and after that the right of the Iroquois to sell the lands of the Delawares. The wily chiefs of the Iroquois realized that the one thing for them to do was to discredit Tedyuskung as to his relation to them, and then break his influence with the council of Pennsylvania. One after another the chiefs asked: "Who made Tedyuskung the great man that he has become?" They denied that he had any authority from them and asked where he had obtained it (Col. Rec. Pa., VIII, 190, 1852.) When Gov. Denny attempted to quiet the anger of these Iroquois by explaining the situation, they listened to him, but when Tedyuskung arose to reply, one by one they left the council room. It was a critical time, but the conference finally ended in a treaty of peace, which was ratified with the western Indians at Pittsburg in 1759.

Post's second mission to Kuskuski and its complete success led to the evacuation of Ft Duquesne by the French and the occupancy of the Ohio by the English.

In 1762 Tedyuskung went to Philadelphia, at which time the governor offered him £400 as a present, if he would withdraw his charge of fraud in the Walking Purchase, which was a source of trouble to the proprietors. The old chief said that he himself had never made such a charge, but that the French had told them that the English had defrauded them of their lands. The governor then told him that if he would make this statement public he would give him the present. This was done.

After all of his dealings with the governor and the council of Pennsylvania the last of the chiefs of the eastern Delawares went to his home in Wyoming, where in the spring of 1763 his house was set on fire, during one of his drunken debauches, and he was burned to death. The perpetrators of this crime were in all probability either of the Seneca or the Mohawk tribe—more likely of the latter.

The chief failing of this wise old Delaware diplomat was his utter subjection to the power of rum. His white allies did little to help him in this regard. His fondness for it was made use of on all occasions. But, however great this failing, he did much to assure success to the English expedition under Gen. Forbes, and to bring the Iroquois to a realization that the Delawares were "no longer women, but men." He was the most virile chief of the Delaware tribe during the years of their subjugation to the Iroquois. His efforts for peace, with Post's heroic endeavors, did much to win the Ohio from French possession. Without the work of these two men this result could not have been accomplished without the shedding of much blood. A monument to Tedyuskung has been erected in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia.

The name is recorded in various other ways, including Deedjoskon, Detiuscung, Tedeuscung, Tediuscung, Tediuskung, Tedyuscung, Teedyuscung, Tydescung, Tydeuscung. (G. P. D.)

Teeuinge. A large prehistoric pueblo ruin on top of the mesa on the s. side of Rio Chama, about $\frac{1}{2}$ m. from the river and an equal distance below the mouth of Rio Oso (Bear cr.), in Rio Arriba co., N. Mex. It was built of adobe, with foundation walls strengthened by irregular blocks of heavy black lava. Its ground-plan embraces two large rectangular courts. The remains of ten circular kivas and one shrine are to be seen in and about the pueblo, but the walls are reduced to low mounds. The settlement was undoubtedly of Tewa origin. (E. L. H.)

Teharonhiawagon (Te'haron'hiawǎ'k-hon' in Mohawk, usually pronounced T'haron'hiawǎ'k-hon', and T'hañ'hiawǎ'-gǎ' in Onondaga; these two are typical forms of pronunciation of this expression, and of these there are only dialectic variations in the other Iroquoian tribes. The analysis of the Mohawk form, which represents the component elements of the expression in the least compressed shape, is as follows: te-, the prefix of the dual, which becomes in proper names approximately expletive, signifies primarily 'two,' 'double,' 'in a double manner or degree,' indicating aptly the action or presence of two things, especially things double by nature, as the ears, feet, hands, eyes, of the animal body; ha-, the simple prefix personal pronoun of the third person, singular number, masculine sex, and anthropic gender, means 'he'; were this expression the statement of an act rather than an appellative only, the form ho-, 'he-it,' would have been required here; ron'hia-, the nominal stem of the noun oron' hia', a derivative of orok, 'cover,' 'overcast,' 'spread over,' signifies 'sky,' 'firmament,' 'the visible heavens,' or 'blue color'; wǎ'k-, the verb-stem, means 'hold(s),' 'be holding'; and lastly, hon', an adverbial suffix denoting the iteration of the action in time or place denoted by the verb to which it refers; hence, Teharonhiawagon signifies literally 'He is holding the sky in two places,' referring to the action of the two hands; but the form of the personal pronoun employed in the expression indicates that this sentence-word is used merely as an appellative and not as the statement of an act, so that 'He, the Sky-holder,' is a close approximation to the accepted signification. Tradition states that this name was given him by his grandmother, Awēn'hā'i, under the following circumstances: Soon after his birth and the death of his mother, his grandmother asked him and his twin brother, "Do you two know whence you two came, and whither you shall go, when you two depart hence?" This brother replied confidently: "I, myself, do know the place whence you and we have come. Verily, it is from the world on the upper side of the sky. I myself, indeed, will not forget it. I will hold it fast [as if with my hands], the place whence I came." His grandmother said: "Truly, indeed, thou dost know the whole matter. Moreover, I shall call thee, on this account, T'hažn'hiawā' gī (De'hažn'hiawā'k' hon'), for thy memory has not changed, being as if thou hadst just come thence").

An imaginary anthropic being of the cosmogonic philosophy of the Iroquoian and other American mythologies, who for convenience of expression may be called a man-being. To him, the embodiment or personification of life, was attributed by the wise men of the elder time the formation or creation and preservation of life and the living in the normal and the beneficent bodies and things in terrestrial nature. His peculiar character as one of the great primal earth powers of the second great cosmical period is best defined in terms of the manifestations and activities of the various forms of floral and faunal life—reproduction, germination, budding, and growth—on the earth. His parentage was noble, although his paternity was seemingly not definitely fixed. This interpretation and definition of the mythological concept embodied in the dominating character of Teharonhiawagon are given here as those which most satisfactorily account for the motives and activities manifested in his life, notwithstanding the fact that he has been connected in an indefinite way with the sun or light and the sky by such well-known writers as Lafitau, Charlevoix, Le Jeune, Brinton, and others. These writers have probably been misled by regarding the derivation of the name as conclusive evidence as to the reason for its imposition on him. In the most definite of the cosmic mythical traditions of the Iroquoian peoples Teharonhiawagon was a twin brother of Tawiskaron (q. v.), although other and perhaps earlier and more primitive accounts make him a quadruplet along with his brother mentioned above, the number four however being probably suggested by the well-nigh universal cult of the four quarters.

toire du Canada (1636, repr. 1836) he wrote it Youskeha, but in the accompanying Dictionnaire Huronne it appears under the form Yoscaha. In the Jesuit Relations it is commonly written Jouskeha (Iskeha), rarely therein Jouskeha, although the last is approximately phonetically correct. According to Peter D. Clarke, a native Wyandot (Huron) historian (Traditional Hist. Wyandotts, 150, 1870), this name should be written Tezhuskahau, which, he says, is the cognomen of the "God of the Forest, or Nature." His translation is approximately correct, as will appear hereafter. This spelling shows that the Jouskeha form of the Jesuit Relations is preferable to that of Iouskeha; but Tezhuskahau of Clarke may be Tidjōskā'ā, a contracted form of Tisio'skā'ā, the component elements of which are: ti-, a demonstrative pronominal prefix referring to size, number, or quantity, 'so,' 'so much,' 'so many'; s-, the iterative adverbial prefix, 'again,' 'anew'; io-, the prefix personal pronoun of the third person, singular number, zoic gender, meaning 'it'; skā'-, the nominal stem of the noun os'kā, 'sprout,' 'shoot'; and ā'-, the adjective 'little,' 'small,' sometimes with the caritative sense, 'dear little.' The expression then signifies, 'So it (is) again a dear little sprout.' This is clearly an epithet expressive of the floral side of the character of Teharonhiawagon. This expression is paralleled in signification and composition by the Mohawk Oteroñtoñ-ni'ā, sometimes accompanied by the term Wā'ā, 'maple,' of which the Onondaga Odēñ'doñni'ā is only a dialectic variant. The analysis of the Mohawk expression is as follows: o-, the prefix personal pronoun of the third person, singular number, zoic gender, meaning 'it'; te-, a modified form of the reflexive pronoun, signifying 'self'; roñt-, the nominal stem of the noun oroñ'tā, 'it-tree'; oñni'-, the verbal stem of the perfect tense, signifying 'has made'; ā'-, the adjective meaning 'little,' 'small,' and refers to the accompanying noun-stem; the expression then signifies: 'It self a small tree has made,' or 'It has made itself into a small tree,' i. e. 'a sapling.' These derivations of the chief appellatives commonly applied to Teharonhiawagon show that he was never connected in any manner with sun, sky, or dawn.

Teharonhiawagon has been erroneously identified by different authors with Hia-watha (q. v.), with Agreskwe (Are-guēns'kuā, 'The Reason or Cause for Absence'), the Iroquoian War god, and with Agatkonchoria, 'Masked Face,' the name of a society whose members are professed exorcists of disease, deriving their authority from Hadu'i" (Onondaga) or Shagodiowe" gōwā, the primal being of disease and contemporary of Teharonhiawagon. Megapolensis gives Athzockuatoriaho as another Mohawk epithet of Teharonhiawagon.

Like most American Indian mythologies, the Iroquoian deals with three great mythic cosmical periods. In the first dwelt a race of gigantic anthropic beings—man-beings, let them be called, because though they were reputed to have been larger, purer, wiser, more ancient, and possessed of more potent orenda (q. v.), than man, and having superior ability to perform the great elemental functions characterizing definitely the things represented by them, they nevertheless had the form, mien, and mind of man, their creator; for unconsciously did man create the gods, the great primal beings of cosmic time—the controllers or directors, or impersonations, of the bodies and phenomena of nature—in his own image. To these man-beings, therefore, were imputed the thought, manners, customs, habits, and social organization of their creators; notwithstanding this, man regarded them as uncreated, eternal, and immortal; for by a curious paradox, man, mistaking his own mental fictions, his metaphors, for realities, explained his own existence, wisdom, and activities as the divine product of the creations of his own inchoate mind. The dwelling-place of the first great primal beings, characterized by flora and fauna respectively identical with the plant and animal life appearing later on the earth, was conceived to have been the upper surface of the visible sky, which was regarded as a solid plain. Here lived the first beings in peace and contentment for a very long period of time: no one knows or ever knew the length of this first cosmic period of tranquil existence. But there came a time when an event occurred which resulted in a metamorphosis in the state and aspect of celestial and earthly things; in fact, the seeming had to become or to assume the real, and so came to pass the cataclysmic change of things of the first period into that now seen on the earth and in the sky, and the close of this period was the dawn of the gods of this mythology. Into the sunless and moonless skyland—lighted only by the snowy white flowers of the great tree of light, towering high near the lodge of Te'haon-hwēndjiawū'khon ('He the Earth-holder'),—the presiding chief of that realm jealousy crept. This chief, reputed to be invulnerable to sorcery, took a young wife by betrothal in fulfilment of a dream. The name of the young woman was Awēn'hā'i, 'Mature Flowers,' or 'Mature (i. e. Fertile) Earth.' Through the machinations of Fire-dragon of the White Body, the deadly jealousy of the aged presiding chief was kindled against his young spouse. Unfortunately for her welfare, she, by inhaling the breath of her spouse before the completion of the usual ante-nuptial ordeals, became parthenogenetically pregnant. The betrothed husband, not knowing the cause or source of her condition, questioned her chastity, and with reluctance resolved to rid himself of his suspected but innocent spouse, and at the same time to change the nature of all the man-beings who were his neighbors and associates. To accomplish his purpose, he caused the tree of light which stood over the supposed aperture through which the sun now shines to be uprooted, thus forming an abyss into the empyrean of this world. By stealth he cast his unsuspecting young spouse into this abyss. Some traditions say that this occurred after Awēn'hā'i had given birth to a daughter which, by this occurrence, she reconceived and to which she again gave birth on this earth. In like manner the man-beings, Corn, Beans, Sunflower, Tobacco, Deer, Wolf, Bear, Beaver, and all their associates, transformed their kind into the forms and sizes and with the habits by which they are known to-day on earth, and then cast them down into the abyss. Only the ancients, the so-called elder brothers, of these things remained in the skyland. Then the rage of Te'haon-hwēndjiawū'k'-ho subsided. This great cataclysmic change was brought about because none could divine a cure for his illness (jealousy) by "searching his dream-word." Then the tree of light was restored to its place. These events brought about the second cosmical period. The expelled bride, Awēn'hā'i, while falling through cosmic space, or the upper sky, was seen by the water-fowl and water animals of the primal sea, who at once set themselves the task of providing a habitation for her. Some traditions say that the water-fowl of the larger kinds flew up to meet her and to bring her slowly down as she rested on their united backs. While this was being done, the best divers among the water animals brought up from the depths of the sea some wet earth, which was carefully placed on the carapace of the Great Turtle. This earth at once began to expand in size, and on it Awēn'hā'i was gently placed. At once she began to walk about the tiny earth, and it continued to grow in size thereby; she even took handfuls of the earth and scattered it in all directions, which likewise caused it to continue to expand until it had grown so large that she could no longer see its bounds. Then shrubs, red willow, grasses, and other vegetation began to appear. In due time she gave birth to a daughter. After attaining womanhood, this daughter was courted by various animals and beings disguised in the assumed shape of fine-looking young men. But, by her mother's advice, she rejected the suit of all, until a young man of the race of the Great Turtle sought her to wife. He was accepted, and bidden to the lodge of her mother. In the twilight he came bearing two, some say three, arrows, of which one was tipped with a flint point. As the young woman lay down he passed two of the arrows, including the flint-tipped one, over her body; others say that he placed them in the lodge wall just above her body. Then he departed, saying that he would return the next day. At twilight he returned, and, taking his arrows, at once withdrew, saying that he would not return again. In due time the young woman gave birth to twins, one of whom caused her death by violently bursting through her armpit. The name of the culprit was Tawiskaron (q. v.), and that of his brother, the elder, was Teharonhiawagon. Awē'hā'i, the grandmother, being greatly enraged by the death of her daughter, asked the twins which of the twain had committed this act. Tawiskaron quickly replied, accusing his innocent brother. So seizing the supposed culprit, the grandmother cast him far away among the shrubbery. He did not die there, but grew rapidly to manhood; his grandmother hated him bitterly, but was very fond of Tawiskaron.

In time, Teharonhiawagon was taught by his father how to build a lodge, to kindle fire, and to plant and cultivate the ground, his father giving him bean, melon, squash, tobacco, and corn seed. He gave his son likewise the third arrow, by which he must destroy the great water serpent, the Fire-dragon of the White Body, when it should begin to destroy the things he was to create and cause to grow. Teharonhiawagon then toiled at his tasks, forming the animals and birds, and making the useful trees, shrubs, and plants. In all this his grandmother and his twin brother sought to thwart him by all manner of devices, but by the timely counsel of his father he was able to defeat all their efforts. His labor was to prepare the earth for man, whom later he was to create. For ease of transit for man, he had made the rivers and streams with double currents, the one running in one direction and the other in an opposite one; but his brother changed this by putting falls and cascades in the rivers and streams. The grandmother, seeing that Teharonhiawagon had produced great ears of perfect corn, immediately blighted his work, saying, "You desire the people you are about to make to be too happy and too well-provided with necessities." Notwithstanding the opposition of his brother and grandmother to his work for the good of man, he thwarted all their schemes. Finally, the grandmother, who had exhausted all her methods of opposition, challenged her grandson, Teharonhiawagon, to play a game of the bowl and plum-pits, the prize of the winner to be the rulership of the world. The grandson willingly accepted the challenge. According to custom ten days were allowed the contestants to prepare for the struggle of orendas. At the end of this time the grandmother came to the lodge of her grandson, bringing her bowl and plum-pits. He would use her bowl, but not her pits, as they were something alive and under the control of the mind of the grandmother. His own were the crests of chickadees, who had responded to his call for aid. He took six of these crests, and they magically remained alive. When he and his grandmother were ready, Teharonhiawagon called in a loud voice, "All you whose bodies I have formed, do you now put forth your orenda in order that we may conquer in this struggle, so that all of you may live!" Then when it came his turn to shake the bowl, he exclaimed, "Now, verily, shall appear the good or ill fortune of all the things that I have done or made!" The grandmother failed to score, while Teharonhiawagon made the highest score possible at one shake of the bowl, and so won the government of all living things.

Teharonhiawagon, in going from place to place viewing his work, one day found that all the animals he had formed had disappeared. He went at once in many directions seeking them. While thus unsuccessfully engaged, a bird told him that they were shut up in a vast cavern in a rocky cliff, wherein his brother had concealed them. Having discovered the place, he removed the rock that closed the mouth of the cavern and then ordered the animals and the birds to come forth. While the creatures were issuing in obedience to the command of their maker, Tawiskaron and his grandmother, noticing that the animals were again becoming plentiful, and divining the cause, hastened to the mouth of the cavern and at once closed it with the great rock. The few creatures which did not have the opportunity to escape became changed in their natures, which thereafter were evil, uncanny, monstrous, and otkon (q. v.). This incident is seemingly a figurative description of the annual forced hibernation of certain animals and reptiles and the migration of certain birds, and shows that Teharonhiawagon had the power to change the seasons by bringing back the summer.

As the animals were intended to serve for the sustenance of human beings about to be formed, Teharonhiawagon enjoined on them the duty of permitting themselves to be taken, provided men in killing them did it with despatch. In furtherance of this contract he questioned some of the animals to learn in what manner their posterity would defend themselves against human beings. The answer of the Bear was that his posterity would flee to escape; thereupon, Teharonhiawagon stuffed the Bear's legs full of fat and meat in order to make him slow and clumsy in running. The Deer answered that his posterity would stand and not flee, and would bite human beings who hunted them; then Teharonhiawagon twisted out the teeth of the Deer's upper jaw, thus rendering his bite harmless. A similar change was made in the buffalo and the elk.

According to the recorded beliefs of the Hurons in the early decades of the 17th century, it was Iouskeha (I8skeha) who provided them with so many fine rivers and lakes and fertile fields. The earth was dry, for a monstrous Frog had gathered all the waters under its arm-pit, so that Iouskeha and his people could obtain no water except through its agency. To free himself and his people from this bondage, Iouskeha made an incision under the arm-pit of the Frog, through which the waters issued in so great abundance that they overflowed the earth, forming rivers, lakes, and seas. Without Iouskeha, they said, their kettles would not boil, for he had learned from the Turtle the art of kindling fire, and this art he had taught them; by his aid alone their hunting was successful: were it not for him they could not so easily have captured game animals, for they had not always enjoyed freedom, having been confined in a vast cavern. In freeing them Iouskeha so charmed them by an arrow stroke in the foot as they came forth that he might easily afterward control and dispose of them at will. The Wolf escaped this stroke, hence it is difficult to take him in the chase. It is from Iouskeha, they said, that they had their verdant fields, corn, beans, tobacco, squashes, and sunflowers; abundant corn harvests and lodges filled with matured ears of corn they owed to no one but Iouskeha. Early in 1636 these Indians were greatly perturbed by the reputed omens of an approaching famine. Iouskeha had been seen in vision, sad, and as lean as a skeleton, holding in his hand a shriveled ear of corn, and some even added that he carried the leg of a human being, which he tore with his teeth. All these were to them infallible signs of a year of great scarcity. Among these same Hurons, Awěⁿ'hā'i, the grandmother of Iouskeha or Teharonhiawagon, was known by the name Ataentsic or Eataentsic (i. e. Eia'tāgēⁿ'tcl', 'She Whose Body is Ancient'), which in accordance with the custom of avoiding the utterance of a person's proper name, supplanted her real name. These Hurons believed that their Iouskeha and his grandmother dwelt in a great lodge situated at the eastern (some said western) extremity of the world—that is, not much farther away than the bounds of their hunting grounds; this lodge of Iouskeha was built on the model of their own, and it was reputed to be stocked with an abundance of corn, beans, squashes, sunflower oil, and various dried meats—with all things to support life in great plenty; they believed that he and his grandmother planted and cultivated land, worked, drank, ate, slept, and were lascivious like themselves; that all the animals of the world belonged to them; that Iouskeha was very kind and gave growth to all things, sending fine weather and other good gifts; that he had charge and care of the living, and of the things that concerned life, and so he was judged good. On the contrary, his grandmother had charge of the souls, the manes, and because the Indians believed that she (the Earth) caused men to die, they adjudged her wicked and destructive, and not because she sometimes sent bad weather or at times undid the good things done by her grandson; they believed that Iouskeha grew old like all living things, but that he had the power instantly to rejuvenate himself, and so he never died; that at death the soul of man went directly to the lodge of Iouskeha and Awěⁿ'hā'i to dance in the presence of this Woman Ancient of Days for her health. These are substantially the current Iroquois beliefs regarding Teharonhiawagon.

One of the most important and far-reaching of the final labors of Teharonhiawagon on this earth was his great victory in a contest of orendas over the hunchback Hadu'i, the unborn primal being, Disease and Death, whose forfeiture of life was redeemed by his promise to aid man by curing, on certain conditions, diseases arising from the infection of the earth with the malign potency of the body of Hadu'i by his having first wandered over it. To this event the important Masked-face Society of exorcists of disease owes its origin. At the New Year ceremony its members essay to exorcise and banish disease and death-causing agencies from the community.

The great and most important New Year ceremony among the Iroquois who still hold to their ancient faith and customs, at which is burned a pure-white dog as a sacrifice, is held in honor of Teharonhiawagon for his works, blessings, and goodness, which have been enjoyed by the people. See Mythology, Nanabozho, Tawiskaron. (J. N. B. H.)

Tehata (probably Cora teuit or teáta, 'man.'—Brinton). A former settlement of the Nevome of Sonora, Mexico, neighbors of the Basiroa, who lived E. of the Huvaguere and Tehuizo, who in turn resided about 8 leagues E. of Tepahue.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864.

Tehoragwanegen ('He has placed two planets together'). An Iroquois war-chief of the Caughnawaga Mohawk, Quebec, known also as Thomas Williams; born about 1758-59. His mother was Mary de Roguers, granddaughter of the Rev. John Williams, of Deerfield, Mass., who, with the portion of his family not murdered on the spot, was taken captive by a band of French and Indians on the night of Feb. 29, 1704. Eunice, one of John Williams' daughters, while a captive became strongly attached to the Indians, and afterward, at the instance of the Jesuits, married a Caughnawaga chief known as De Roguers, to whom she bore three children, Catherine, Mary, and John. Mary, the mother of John, the subject of this sketch, died when the latter was only 15 months old, and he was then adopted by his aunt Catherine, the wife of a noted Caughnawaga chief, X. Rice, who had no heirs. Tehoragwanegen, having been born and reared among the Indians, acquired their habits and language. As a boy he was active and sprightly. He was reared by his aunt in the Roman Catholic faith. During the early years of the American Revolution, although then only about 17 years of age, Tehoragwanegen accompanied the war-parties of his tribe on various expeditions against the colonists of the northern frontiers. It appears that his grandmother, Eunice, persistently urged him to follow these hostile bands to prevent, when possible, the massacre of defenceless women and children, and on various occasions he bent every effort to have the American prisoners treated with humanity and kindness. In 1777, at the head of his band, he joined the army of Gen. Burgoyne and took an active part in the campaign around Saratoga that ended in Burgoyne's surrender. Having remonstrated with Burgoyne against the needless cruelty shown toward the colonists by the western Indians, among whom were the Ottawa, Chipewa, Menominee, and Winnebago, Burgoyne rebuked them so severely that they became offended and soon afterward deserted the army. Had Tehoragwanegen's advice been followed, the murder of Miss Jane McCrea near Ft. Edward, N. Y., would never have been perpetrated. In 1780 he was attached to the corps of Sir John Johnson during its desolating operations in the Mohawk valley, and expressed so strong disapproval of the conduct of the Tories and some of the allied Indian warriors that he aroused the jealousy and hatred of Johnson, who feared, however, an open rupture with him on account of his high standing with Gov. Carleton of Canada for his valued services to the government. After the peace of 1783, Tehoragwanegen visited his relatives in New England, where he met the Rev. Samuel Kirkland, the celebrated missionary. In 1789, with two others of his tribe, he took steps toward negotiations which resulted in the treaty of New York in 1796, between the state and the Seven Nations of Canada, by which these Indians were compensated for lands of which they had been deprived. The other two delegates were Ohnawio ('Good Stream') and Atiatharongwen ('His Body is Taken Down from Hanging'), alias Colonel Lewis Cook.

In 1800 Tehoragwanegen took his two sons to be educated among his relatives. One of these was Eleazer Williams (q. v.), the reputed Dauphin of France. In 1801, Tehoragwanegen, with a party of Caughnawaga, visited, in behalf of the Northwest Bay Company, the Red r. and the Rocky mts. He warmly espoused the American cause during the War of 1812. His death occurred at his native village, Aug. 16, 1849, at the advanced age of 91. See Williams' Life of Te-ho-ra-gwa-nen, 1859. (J. N. B. H.)

Teh-toot-sah. See Dohusan.

Tehueco (according to Buelna the name is from the Cahita term teeca, tehueca, 'sky'; or from teeca 'sky,' and tehueli 'blue'). One of the Cahita tribes living on the Rio Fuerte, about lat. 26° 40', n.w. Sinaloa, Mexico. It included the settlements of Biara, Charac, Hichucio, Matapan, Sibirioja, and Tehueco. The dialect spoken was the same as that of the Zuaque. Tegueco.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864. Tehueco.—Ibid. Zuaque.—Ibid. (referring to the dialect; strictly a distinct division).

Tehueco. Formerly the principal pueblo of the Tehueco tribe, on the E. bank of Rio Fuerte, n. w. Sinaloa, Mexico. Teguaco.—Kino, map (1702) in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 1726. Teguéco.—Hardy, Trav. in Mex., 438, 1829. Tehueco.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., map, 1864.

Tehuierichic (referring to a rock in the form of a girl). A small pueblo of the Tarahumare, with a mission church, situated s. E. of Batopilas, s. w. Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Teguierichic.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 323, 1864.

Tehuizo. A subdivision or settlement of the Nevome, described as neighbors of the Hios, who were settled 8 leagues E. of Tepahue (Tepachi?), in E. Sonora, Mexico. Tehuizo.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864. Tehuizo.—Ibid., 351.

Teiakhochoe (Té'iaqjōtcoē). A Chinookan tribe formerly residing on the w. bank of Columbia r., in Columbia co., Oreg., about 3 m. above Oak point.—Boas, Kathlamet Texts, 6, 1901.

Teiyughsaragarat. See Onechsagerat.

Tejeuingge Ouiping (Te-je-Uing-ge O-uiping). The ruins of a prehistoric Tewa pueblo on the s. slope of the hills on which stands the present pueblo of San Juan, on the Rio Grande in New Mexico. According to Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 84, 1892) the Tewa claim that this pueblo marks the center of the range of their people, and that the division into two branches, of which the Tewa became the northern and the Tano the southern, took place there in very ancient times.

Tejey. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Tejolocachic. A Tarahumare settlement on the headwaters of Paphigochic r., w. Chihuahua, Mexico, about 8 m. s. of Matlachic.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 323, 1864.

Tejon (Span.: 'raccoon'). A local name often applied to certain groups of Indians at the s. end of San Joaquin valley, Cal. It includes Indians of three linguistic families: Ft Tejon, on Cañada de las Uvas, was held by a division of the Chumash; the upper part of Tejon rancho, including the part of Tejon cr. in the mountains, was held by the Shoshonean Gitanemuk; the lower part of this stream and rancho, including the present ranch settlement (the headquarters of a reservation established in 1853) on Paso cr., belonged either to the same Shoshoneans or to the Yokuts tribe called Yauelmani, or at least was visited by the latter. On the establishment of the Tejon res in 1853, Indians from a considerable area were assembled thereon. In 1864 most of these were removed to Tule River res., where the Yauelmani are now popularly known as Tejon Indians. On Tejon rancho, at the base of the mountains, there is still a settlement, mainly of Shoshoneans, and these principally of the Gitanemuk. (H. W. H.)

Tejones (Span.: 'raccoons'). A tribe living at Reynosa, Mexico, on the Rio Grande, at the time of its foundation in the middle of the 18th century. In 1757, when Tienda de Cuervo inspected the new settlement, he reported that this was the native place of the Tejones (Revista, 1757, MS. in Archivo Gen.). Pimentel (Lenguas, ii, 409, 1865) uses the name as synonymous with Coahuilteco. If this is correct, it probably settles the question of the linguistic affiliation of their associates, as the Comecrudos, Pintos, Mayapemes, Cueros Quemados, Zalapaguemes, and others. By 1757 the Tejones had entered the missions at both Reynosa and Camargo, but in greater numbers at the former place, where they mingled with the tribes named above (Mission records in the parish churches at Reynosa and Camargo, examined in 1907). According to Ripperdá, governor of Texas, by 1773 most of the tribe had acquired the Spanish language (Complaint about the enslavement of Indians in Nuevo Santander, MS. in Béxar Archives, 1773). The existing mission records at Reynosa and Camargo show that the Tejones remained at these missions well into the 19th century. The remnant of the tribe, together with a few Comecrudos and Pintos, still live (1907) between modern Reynosa and Camargo, at Las Prietas, which is about on the site of Old Reynosa, where Cuervo found the Tejones in 1757. Dr. A. S. Gatschet reported them at the same place in 1887. (H. E. B.)

Tekakwitha, Catherine (called also the "Indian Saint," "La Sainte Sauvagesse," and the "Lily of the Mohawks"). The daughter of a Mohawk warrior by a Catholic Christian Algonkin woman who had been captured by the Iroquois at Three Rivers, Quebec; born in 1656 at Caughnawaga, a palisaded town of the Turtle clan of the Mohawk, on Mohawk r., near the present Auriesville, N. Y. Tekakwitha was about 4 years of age when the village was ravaged by smallpox, among its victims being her mother, who left an infant son that did not long survive. Tekakwitha was about 10 years of age when De Tracy burned the Mohawk villages, an act resulting in the general peace of 1666. After the destruction of their settlement, the Turtle clan removed to the N. side of Mohawk r., where Tekakwitha was reared by her uncle, a bitter opponent of the Christian faith. A couple of years later, Fathers Bruyas, Fremin, and Pierron visited her uncle for three days, during which time she waited on them, thus gaining her first knowledge of Christian faith and practice. On Easter Sunday, 1675, she was baptized by Father Lamberville, and at once became the object of contempt and derision to many of her tribe, the persecution continuing for about two years. By refusing to marry she had already incurred the displeasure and anger of her aunt; for observing the Sabbath she was denied food, and because she would not labor in the corn-fields on that day, she was stoned; a young Mohawk warrior went so far as to raise his tomahawk menacingly over her head, but she awaited the blow with such calmness that her assailant desisted and slunk away.

When still quite young Tekakwitha aided her mother in her domestic duties, and when not thus occupied amused herself, like other Indian children, with her toys. She dressed like other girls of her age, and ornamented her person with necklaces, bracelets, finger-rings, and ear-bobs. As a young woman she was well poised and skilful in doing such work as Indian girls were accustomed to do in elk-hair and porcupine-quills, and from bark and other fibers she made bands for carrying burdens. She also became so adept in the manufacture of wampum belts, such as were used in public affairs, that she was frequently employed in making them. She could also sew well in the Caucasian way, having learned the art from French prisoners among her tribe. She made ribbons or bands of eel-skins, sashes from the fibers of bark, baskets and boxes of willow bark and twigs, and bark buckets for carrying water; she likewise learned how to make pestles for pounding corn; in short, she was ever busy with the multiplicity of duties that fell to the lot of Indian women generally. Although frail, Tekakwitha was the first at work in the morning. The years before her baptism passed in this manner, and she had no other ideals set before her than those current among her pagan relations. It is said she was virtuous in every way, was not attached to beliefs in visions or dreams, had no desire to take part in dances or games, and was not cruel, even to prisoners, like other Indian girls—in short, she was of a disposition unusual among the girls of her time and people.

At this time a number of fervent Catholic Christian Iroquois dwelt at the Sault Saint Louis, some of whom were in the habit of making visits to the villages of the Iroquois in New York for the purpose of proselyting their kindred to the new faith. One of the most successful of these, a former inhabitant and chief of the Oneida village, was Ogenratarihen ('Hot Ashes'), sometimes called Louis Garonhiagué. In 1677, while making a tour of the Indian villages, on learning that Tekakwitha was persecuted on account of her new faith, he, with two companions, placed her in a canoe and started for the Sault, where she arrived in the autumn, bearing letters from Father Lamberville extolling her virtues. Here she grew in Christian knowledge and in the exercises of a holy life, practising great austerities. Visiting Montreal, she saw the nuns of Marguerite Bourgeois at their school work, and aware of the charity of the Hospital Sisters of Ville-Marie shown toward her people, she sought to found a convent on Heron id., among the rapids of Saint Lawrence r. This project was ridiculed by her friends, and even the father was amused; he nevertheless permitted her to make a vow of chastity, and thus she became the first Indian nun among her people. Among the means which Tekakwitha undertook to mortify her body was to engage a friend to flagellate her every Sunday for a year, when she became too weak to bear it longer.

She died Apr. 17, 1680, and was buried s. of La Chine rapids of the St. Lawrence, midway between La Prairie and Caughnawaga, Quebec. Six days after her death Father Chaudetière, while at prayer, "had a vision in which Catherine arrayed in glory appeared to him." Her remarkable life so impressed the minds of the faithful, both Indians and whites, that many came to pray at her tomb. It is said that many persons who were ill have been healed through invoking her intercession in their behalf, and that many striking visions and revelations have taken place at her tomb. There is a memorial cross bearing an inscription at Auriesville, N. Y., and at St Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, N. Y., a statue stands in memory of her. Until 1888 a tall mission cross marked her burial place, but in that year the Rev. C. A. Walworth, of Albany, N. Y., erected near it a large granite sarcophagus, bearing the legend in native words, "A beautiful flower, it has blossomed among native men." Tenankutchin ('mountain people'). An Athapaskan tribe in Alaska which hunts throughout the basin of Tanana r. and has its villages along the upper stream in lat. 63°, lon. 142°. Dall in 1866 found them almost in a state of nature. Once a year, without their women, they descended the river to the neutral trading post Nuklukayet. They traveled in birch canoes, wore pointed parkies trimmed with beads and feathers, their hair being ochred. Sometimes they journeyed up the Yukon to Ft Yukon for trade. They have more beadwork and are more skilled in its manufacture than any other tribe in Alaska. They use dogs as pack animals and for drawing sleds. They build only temporary shelters, moving from place to place during the year. Deer, moose, and caribou form their chief means of subsistence; these are captured by means of a brush fence extended many miles, in which at intervals snares are set. In many respects the Tenankutchin resemble the Unakhotana, but are reputed to be very fierce and warlike. A peculiar drawling tone characterizes their speech, distinguishing it from the Ahtena. Dentalium nose ornaments were formerly universally worn by the men, but of late they are falling into disuse. These people are much feared by the surrounding tribes. They are supposed to have a totemic system. Their population was given by Richardson in 1851 as 100; by Dall, 1870, 500; Petroff made it from 300 to 700 in 1880; Allen estimated the population in 1885 at 600; the 11th Census (1890) gave it as 373. Divisions of the tribe are Clatchotin, Huntlatin, Nabesnata, Nukluktana, Nutzotin, Santotin, and Tolwatin. The villages Nandell and Tetling belong to the Nutzotin. In the lower river is Tutlut; at the mouth of the Tanana is Weare, and at the mouth of the Tozi is Tozikakat. Nuklukayet, the mart of other tribes also, is in their territory. Khiltats is one of the winter villages.

Gens de butte.—Whymper, Alaska, 255, 1869. Gens des Buttes.—Ross, MS. notes on Tinne, B. A. E. Tendoy. Chief of a band of mixed Bannock, Shoshoni, and Tukuariika Indians making their headquarters in the Lemhi valley, Idaho; best known through his friendly attitude toward the whites. About 1869, the attention of the Government having been called to the miserable condition of these Indians, they were found on investigation to be almost destitute, but Tendoy had been able to improve the condition of himself and a few of his followers by his sagacity in trade with the settlers in the mining camps of Montana, which he frequently visited. On the establishment of an Indian agency in Lemhi valley the Indians promised obedience to the agent and friendliness toward the settlers, and owing to the influence of Tendoy these promises were kept inviolate. He rendered valuable service to settlers by protecting them from roving bands of unfriendly Indians, and through his influence no white person in the Lemhi valley was molested during the Nez Percé war. In 1878 the agent reported that some of the Indians would doubtless join the hostiles, "but are held in check by Tendoy, who appears to have proven himself master of the situation." Some of the Indians with whom he associated in the buffalo country advised him to steal horses and kill a few whites, when the authorities at Washington would think more of him and grant his people a larger appropriation. To this he is said to have replied, "I have not the blood of a white man in my camp, nor do I intend such." Tendoy died on the Lemhi reservation May 9, 1907. The settlers, in appreciation of his services, subscribed funds toward the erection of a monument to his memory, and a tract of land containing a number of other Indian graves was set apart for his burial place. (F. S. N.)

Teneangopti, Teneangpots. See Kicking Bird.

Tenedi (Tē'nedi, 'bark-house people'). A branch of the Tihittan living at Klawak, Alaska. (J. R. S.)

Teneinamar. A former tribe in the vicinity of the lower Rio Grande, Texas, spoken of in connection with the Pinanaca and Siacher. Perhaps identical with the Taimanares, elsewhere referred to.—Fernando del Bosque (1675) in Nat. Geog. Mag., xiv, 344, 1903.

Teneraca. A Tepehuane pueblo situated in a deep gorge of Mezquital r., in s. Durango, Mexico. It is under the missionary jurisdiction of Mezquital.—Lumholtz Unknown Mexico, i, 469, 1902.

Santiago Tenerraza.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 318, 1864.

Tenicapeme. A tribal name appearing in the baptismal records for 1800 at Matamoros, Mexico. It may be the same as Talapagneme, which occurs in the contemporary records for San José mission, Texas; this, in turn, is evidently the same as Salapagueme, the name of a tribe well known at that time at Reynosa and Camargo, on the Rio Grande (Baptismal records at Matamoros, Reynosa, and Camargo, and, for San José mission, at San Antonio, Texas). (H. E. B.)

Tenino. A Shahaptian tribe formerly occupying the valley of Des Chutes r., Oregon. The Tenino dialect was spoken on both sides of the Columbia from The Dalles to the mouth of the Umatilla. In 1855 they joined in the Wasco treaty and were placed on Warm Spring res., since which time they have usually been called Warm Springs Indians (q. v.), a term embracing a number of tribes of other stocks which were included in the treaty. The present number of Tenino is unknown, but it is probably not more than 30. (L. F.)

Mili'-léma.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 742, 1896 (own name). Mili-hhléma.—Gatschet in Mag. Am. Hist., 1, 168, 1877 (own name). Tenino.—Wasco treaty (1855) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 622, 1878. Terrino.—Huntington in Ind. Aff. Rep., 72, 1867 (misprint). Tishy-éai-hhléma.—Gatschet, loc. cit. (Warm Springs Ind. name for themselves). Warm Spring Indians.—Gatschet, ibid. Warm Springs.—Common official designation.

Tennessee (Tá'núsi' or Tánu'). The name of two or more Cherokee settlements at an early period. The principal one was on Little Tennessee r., a short distance above its junction with the main stream, in E. Tennessee. Another was on an extreme head branch of Tuckasegee r., above the present Webster, N. C. The name has lost its meaning, all the so-called derivations being fanciful. (J. M.)

Tennessee.—Timberlake, Memoirs, map, 1765.

Tennuthkutchin ('middle people'). An extinct division of the Kutchakutchin that formerly dwelt between the rapids of the Yukon and the mouth of Porcupine r., Alaska. Gibbs (ca. 1857) said they numbered 10 hunters. In 1863 they were swept away, according to Dall, by an epidemic of scarlet fever introduced by the whites.

Birch Indians.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Tenskwatawa (Ten-skun'-tu-wa skwíte 'door,' thénut 'to be open': 'The Open Door', called also Elakwatawa.—Gatschet). The famous "Shawnee Prophet," twin brother of Tecumseh prominent in Indian and American history immediately before the War of 1812. His original name was Lalawéthika, referring to a rattle or similar instrument. According to one account he was noted in his earlier years for stupidity and intoxication; but one day, while lighting his pipe in his cabin, he fell back apparently lifeless and remained in that condition until his friends had assembled for the funeral, when he revived from his trance, quieted their alarm, and announced that he had been conducted to the spirit world. In Nov. 1805, when hardly more than 30 years of age, he called around him his tribesmen and their allies at their ancient capital of Wapakoneta, within the present limits of Ohio, and announced himself as the bearer of a new revelation from the Master of Life. "He declared that he had been taken up to the spirit world and had been permitted to lift the veil of the past and the future—had seen the misery of evil doers and learned the happiness that awaited those who followed the precepts of the Indian god. He then began an earnest exhortation, denouncing the witchcraft practices and medicine juggleries of the tribe, and solemnly warning his hearers that none who had part in such things would ever taste of the future happiness. The firewater of the whites was poison and accursed; and those who continued its use would be tormented after death with all the pains of fire, while flames would continually issue from their mouths. This idea may have been derived from some white man's teaching or from the Indian practice of torture by fire. The young must cherish and respect the aged and infirm. All property must be in common, according to the ancient law of their ancestors. Indian women must cease to intermarry with white men; the two races were distinct and must remain so. The white man's dress, with his flint and steel, must be discarded for the old-time buckskin and the firestick. More than this, every tool and every custom derived from the whites must be put away, and the Indians must return to the methods the Master of Life had taught them. When they should do all this, he promised that they would again be taken into the divine favor, and find the happiness which their fathers had known before the coming of the whites. Finally, in proof of his divine mission, he announced that he had received power to cure all diseases and to arrest the hand of death in sickness or on the battlefield" (Drake, Life of Tecumseh). The movement was therefore a conservative reaction against the breakdown of old customs and modes of life due to white contact, but it had at first no military object, offensive or defensive.

Intense excitement followed the prophet's announcement of his mission, and a crusade commenced against all suspected of dealing in witchcraft. The prophet very cleverly turned the crusade against any who opposed his supernatural claims, but in this he sometimes overreached himself, and lost much of his prestige in consequence.

He now changed his name to Tenskwá-tawa, significant of the new mode of life which he had come to point out to his people, and fixed his headquarters at Greenville, Ohio, where representatives from the various scattered tribes of the N. W. gathered about him to learn the new doctrines. To establish his sacred character and to dispel the doubts of the unbelievers he continued to dream dreams and announce wonderful revelations from time to time. A miracle which finally silenced all objections was the prediction of an eclipse of the sun which took place in the summer of 1806; this was followed by his enthusiastic acceptance as a true prophet and the messenger of the Master of Life. The enthusiasm now spread rapidly, and emissaries traveled from tribe to tribe as far as the Seminole and the Siksika, inculcating the new doctrines. Although this movement took much the same form everywhere, there were local variations in rituals and beliefs. Prominent among these latter was a notion that some great catastrophe would take place within four years, from which only the adherents of the new prophet would escape. In most places the excitement subsided almost as rapidly as it had begun, but not before it had given birth among the Northern tribes to the idea of a confederacy for driving back the white people, one which added many recruits to the British forces in the War of 1812. Its influence among Southern tribes was manifested in the bloody Creek war of 1813. The prophet's own influence, however, and the prestige of the new faith were destroyed by Harrison's victory in the vicinity of the town of Tippecanoe, where he had collected 1,000 to 1,200 converts, Nov. 7, 1811. After the War of 1812 Tenskwatawa received a pension from the British government and resided in Canada until 1826, when he rejoined his tribe in Ohio and the following year moved to the w. side of the Mississippi, near Cape Girardeau, Mo. About 1828 he went with his band to Wyandotte co., Kans., where he was interviewed in 1832 by George Catlin, who painted his portrait, and where he died, in Nov. 1837, within the limits of the present Argentine. His grave is unmarked and the spot unknown. Although his personal appearance was marred by blindness in one eye, Tenskwatawa possessed a magnetic and powerful personality, and the religious fervor he created among the Indian tribes, unless we except that during the recent "ghost dance" disturbance, has been equaled at no time since the beginning of white contact. See Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896, and authorities therein cited. (J. M.)

Ten Tribes of Israel. See Lost Ten Tribes.

Tenn. A tribe or subtribe which entered San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas, about 1740, with the numerous group to which the Sana (q. v.) belonged. The affiliation of the Sana seems to have been Tonkawan. Some words of their language have been preserved. (H. E. B.)

Tena.—Valero Baptisms, 1740, partida 509, MS.

Tenyo. The Pine clan of the Tewa pueblo of Hano, N. E. Ariz., consisting of 29 persons in 1903.

Ten-yo.—Fewkes in Am. Anthr., vii, 166, 1894.

Teopari. A former pueblo of the Jova and seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1676; situated in E. Sonora, Mexico, a few miles s. e. of the Opatá village of Nacori. Pop. 369 in 1678; 259 in 1730. Dolores was its visita. The pueblo was abandoned between 1764 and 1800 owing to Apache depredations.

Teoskahatay. A Mdewakanton Sioux who accompanied Lesueur to Montreal in 1695 to evidence the good faith of the Sioux tribes in a treaty with the French and Chippewa relating to trade and the passage of the Saint Croix route to the Mississippi. He died at Montreal.

Teotongniaton. A former village of the Neuters in Ontario.

S. Guillaume.—Jes. Rel. 1641, 78, 1858 (mission name). Teotongniaton.—Ibid.

Tepachi (the name of a drink made from fermented aguamas or jocuixtes.—Buelna). A pueblo of the Opatá and seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1678; situated on Rio Soyopa, N. E. Sonora, Mexico, about lat. 29° 30'. Pop. 388 in 1678.

S. Joaquin y Sta. Ana Tepachi.—Zapata (1678) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 246, 1884. Tepache.—Rivera, Diario, leg. 1382, 1736. Tepachi.—Escudero, Noticias de Sonora y Sinaloa, 101, 1849.

Tepachio ('stony place.'—Och). A Tarahumare settlement in Chihuahua, Mexico; definite locality unknown.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 322, 1864.

Tepachuaches. A tribe, probably Coahuiltecan, encountered by Salinas on the road from Coahuila to San Francisco mission, Texas, in 1693.—Salinas (1693) in Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, MS.

Tepahue. A division of the Mayo and also its principal settlement, situated in the mountains about the upper forks of Mayo r., S. Sonora, Mexico. They spoke a dialect slightly different from the Mayo (Zapata, 1678, in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., III, 385, 1857). The inhabitants of Conicari, a subdivision of this tribe, appear from Zapata's statement to have spoken a dialect somewhat different from the Tepahue proper (Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 53, 1890). According to Ribas (Hist. Trium., 254, 1845), after the reduction of the Mayo the Tepahue established themselves in a pueblo (presumably Tepahue) on upper Mayo r., with "about 600 families, and some 2,000 persons of all ages." The same authority states that Conicari contained about 200 families. According to Orozco y Berra the Tepahue are extinct as a tribe, but there is still a Conicari settlement on or near the ancient site.

Tepecano (Nahuatl: tepetl 'mountain', 'hill'; aco 'on top of.'—Hrdlička). A small tribe or subtribe of the Tepehuane, living in the sierras of N. Jalisco, Mexico. They are now confined to the pueblo of Askeltan and to a territory not exceeding 150 sq. m. of the valley of the Rio de Bolaños. Their dwellings, where not modified by Spanish influence, consist of one or two small low structures built of unworked stones laid without mortar.

The hair of the men is worn from 3 to 6 in. in length, while that of the women hangs in braids down the back. The present population is estimated at 300. They have as principal officers a gobernador and an alcalde, who are elective. Their pueblos, ancient and modern, are Acapulco, Askeltan, Borego, Huila (Huilaatlan), Mesitas, Nostic, Santa Catarina, Temistian. See Hrdlička in Am. Anthr., v, no. 3, 1903.

Hu-mā-kam.—Hrdlička in Am. Anthr., v, 403, 1903 ('the ones,' 'the people': own name). Hu-māt-kam.—Ibid. (alternative form). Wá-culi.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., II, 123, 1902 (Huichol name for Tepecano and Tepehuane). Xumácam.—Ibid. ('the people': own name).

Tepehuane (said by Buelna to be from Nahuatl tepetl 'mountain', huan 'at the junction of'). A Piman tribe formerly

TEPECANO MAN (AM. MUS. NAT. HIST.)

inhabiting mainly the state of Durango, Mexico, but extending also into S. Chihuahua, N. E. and S. W. Sinaloa, N. E. Jalisco, N. Zacatecas, and S. W. Coahuila. They occupied also, with the Nevome and Tarahumare, the village of Tutuaca, about lat. 28° 20', in W. Chihuahua. Before the advent of the Spanish missionaries among them in 1596 they lived in rancherías among rocks and rugged places, their huts being neatly made of logs, stone, or adobe. They were regarded as brave and warlike, and the Tarahumare and Acaxes suffered greatly from their aggressiveness. They revolted against the Spaniards in 1616, killed all the missionaries, desolated the country, and it is said marched with 25,000 warriors against the city of Durango, but were repulsed by 1,000 Spaniards with a loss of 15,000. The remainder fled to the eastern slope of the Sierra Madre, between lat. 25° and 26°, where most of them, until recent years, led a precarious existence in isolated petty communities without a tribal government. According to the missionaries who labored among them, the Tepehuane were not addicted to lying or theft, and lewdness and drunk-

eness were very uncommon among them. Though always ready to defend their settlements against invasion, and notwithstanding their reputation for valor, they have been rather an agricultural than a warlike people. They possessed a number of idols, the principal of which was called Ubamari; their chief settlement was named after it, and formerly offerings of arrows, pottery, bones of animals, flowers, and fruit were made to it. Lumholtz (Unknown Mexico, I, 1902), who visited the tribe during various explorations in 1890-98, says that they are agriculturists, depending almost wholly upon the cultivation of the soil for subsistence. Though maize is their chief reliance other plants are cultivated and cotton is raised to some extent. They always have sufficient corn for their own use, which they store in square upright cribs of canes held in place by withes, on a framework of pine poles. Their houses are commodious log cabins, often with gabled roofs covered with large shingles weighted down. They make of maguey fiber sacks and ropes of excellent quality, as well as girdles and ribbons of wool and cotton for trade, chiefly in Durango. Like most Mexican Indians, they find pleasure in drinking mescal and pulque; their only dance is ceremonial; no games are in use, and gambling or betting is forbidden. Although nominally Christians, they still practise to some extent the rites and ceremonies of their ancient religion. Lumholtz gives 900 as the population of Lajas, or the northern section, and 3,000 as that of the southern section, but according to Hrdlička they number in all between 4,000 and 5,000, about equally divided between the two sections. Their settlements, past and present, so far as recorded, are: Atotonilco, Baborigame, Basonopa, Cacaria, Caiman, Canatlan, Chimaltitlan (?), Cinco Llagas, Coloradas (?), Durango, Galpa, Guerachic, Huaxicori, Ilamatech, Jícara, Joconostla, Lajas, Mezquital, Milpillas, Navogame, Nazas, Ocotan, Papasquiario, Picachos, Pueblo Nuevo, Quiviquinta, San Antonio, San Bernabé, San Diego del Rio, San José, Santa Catalina, Tasquaringa, Tene-raca, Tepehuane, Tizonazo, Tunal, Tutuaca, Yonora, Zape. Tepehuanes. A Tepehuane pueblo in s. Chihuahua, Mexico, about lat. $26^{\circ} 30'$, lon. $106^{\circ} 30'$.

Tepemaca. One of the tribes living nearest to Dolores, which was not far from Laredo, Texas, in 1757. There is some ground for thinking that they may have been the tribe commonly called by the Spaniards Cueros Quemados ('burnt skins'), who lived on both sides of the Rio Grande above and below Reynosa, Mexico (Tienda de Cueros, Revista, 1757, MS. in Archivo Gen.). (H. E. B.)

Teporachic. A Tarahumare settlement of Chihuahua, Mexico. The total population in 1900 was 261, all regarded as civilized.

Tequassimo. A subtribe of the Choptank, formerly living on Choptank r., Md. In 1749 they were assigned a reservation on the s. bank of the river, in Dorchester co., but by 1837 they had dwindled to a few individuals of mixed Indian and negro blood.—Bozman, Md., i, 115, 1837.

Tequemapo. A Calusa village on the s. w. coast of Florida, about 1570.

Tequemapo.—Fontaneda, as quoted by Shipp, De Soto and Fla., 586, 1881. Tequemapo.—Fontaneda Memoir (ca. 1575), Smith trans., 19, 1864.

Tequenondahi ('on the opposite side of the mountain.'—Hewitt). A village in 1534 on lower St Lawrence r., Quebec.—Cartier (1545), Relation, Tross ed., 32½, 1863.

Tequapis. The name, apparently, of two villages, or perhaps of one village claimed by two missions. One was near San Marcos, the other near Santa Inés, both in Santa Barbara co., Cal.

Tequepas.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861. Tequapis.—Ibid., Apr. 24, 1863.

Tequesta. A rude and piratical tribe of unknown linguistic affinity, occupying the s. e. Florida coast, within the present Dade and Monroe cos., in the 16th century. They were more or less subject to the Calusa, their neighbors on the w. About all that is known of them is contained in brief references in the Fontaneda Memoir (ca. 1575) and in Barcia, Ensayo, 1723, with a short notice in Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 1884. (J. M.)

Teracosick. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, on the w. bank of Nansemond r. in Nansemond co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Terapa. A former Opata pueblo in the immediate vicinity of Guachinera, E. Sonora, Mexico, lat. $30^{\circ} 20'$, lon. 109° . It was occupied for a period in the 18th century by the inhabitants of Batesopa and Baquigopa.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 520, 1892.

Teras. A former Opata pueblo on the upper waters of the Rio Bavispe, 12 leagues n. of Opoto, in E. Sonora, Mexico. It seems to have been the seat of a missionary establishment and contained a small church, but was abandoned in the 18th century, owing to the hostility of the Apache, Suma, and Jocomé.

Tercáo. Mentioned as a pueblo of the province of Atripuy (q. v.), in the region of the lower Rio Grande, N. Mex., in 1598.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871.

Terocodame. A tribe at San Francisco Solano mission, near the Rio Grande, in Coahuila, after 1705. Rivera (Diario, leg. 2763, 1736) mentions it in 1727 as a tribe of Coahuila. Before its removal to San Antonio mission, Texas, Solano was situated "in the Terocodame band" (MS. Baptismal Rec., 1707, partidas 319, 326). The Terocodame seems to have been the most prominent tribe of the locality and to have given its name to the band or confederacy. The baptismal entries mention a certain Manuel, of the Ticmamar nation, who was "captain of the Terocodames" (ibid., 1706, partida 169); a man "of the Oydicán nation and of the Terocodame band" (ibid., 1707, partida 271); a man "of the Babor nation, interpreter for the idiom of the Terocodame band" (ibid., partida 248); a woman "of the Terocodame band and of the Juman nation" (ibid., partida 272), etc. The Terocodame were, however, a distinct tribe or subtribe of this band. The records show that they intermarried with the Gabilan, Viddaquimamar, Oydicán, Ticmamar, Juman, Mauiga, Maubedan, Tuteneiboica, Matuimi, Jicaragrande, and other tribes or subtribes (Baptismal Rec., passim), the intermarriage occurring in many cases certainly while in the gentile state. On Nov. 21, 1706, 58 gentiles of different divisions were baptized. They apparently had come to the mission in a body, hence it may be inferred that they were more or less closely associated. The divisions represented by those baptized or by their parents are Terocodame, Ticmamar, Gabilan, Viddaquimamar, Bacorame, Cucusa, Macocoma (or Ntacocoma), Juman, Mauiga, Julime (or Juribe), Tepeguan, Quizal, Babor, Mamuqui, Mescal, Colorado, Tuteneiboica, Jicaragrande, Matuimi, and Zenizo. The statements as to the parentage of different individuals baptized show that the intermarriages represented many combinations of these groups—another indication that they were closely associated. According to García the Mescal tribe spoke what is known as the Coahuiltecan language. Apparently there were linguistic differences in the group, for while a Babor was called interpreter for the Terocodame, another individual was called interpreter for the Jumanes (ibid., 1706, partida 169). Some of the Terocodame, as well as other tribes of this group, followed the Solano mission to the San Antonio and were baptized at San Antonio de Valero (Baptismal Rec., 1719). (H. E. B.)

Terrapin. Any one of various tortoises of the waters of the Atlantic coast of the United States; specifically Malaco clemmys palustris. The word is spelled in a variety of ways by the early writers. Whitaker (Good Newes from Va., 42, 1613) speaks of "the torope or little turtle"; Campanius (1645) gives the word for tortoise in the Delaware dialect of New Jersey as tulpa or turpa; Rasles (1691) gives for turtle in Abnaki, turbe; Eliot (Levit., xi, 29) renders tortoises by tanuppasog in the Massachusetts dialect; Lawson (Nat. Hist. of Car., 133, 1709) has terebins; Beverley (Virginia, 151, 1722) speaks of "a small kind of turtle, or tarapins (as we call them)." The "Bre'r Tarrypin" of the "Uncle Remus" stories has become famous. Terrapin is a diminutive from the torope or turipe of the Virginian and Delaware dialects of Algonquian. (A. F. C.)

Terrenate. A Pima rancheria visited by Father Kino in 1697; situated near the headwaters of Rio San Pedro, s. of the Arizona-Sonora boundary. A presidio was established there in 1741, and about 1760-64 the population, including a garrison of about 50 men, numbered 411. The presidio was temporarily transferred to or near Guevavi before 1750. Bartlett (Pers. Narr., i, 419, 1854) described it as a village of 200 or 300 persons in 1851; in 1900 it contained 311 civilized inhabitants and 26 Yaqui.

Tesakayala (Tesak'a Yāla, 'place of nude mountains'). One of the mythic settling places of the Zuñi after their emergence from the Underworld.—Cushing in 13th Rep. B. A. E., 390, 1896.

Sextapay.—Taylor quoted by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 176, 1886. Teshaya.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 27, 1860. Texhaya.—Bancroft, op. cit. Texja.—Taylor, op. cit.

Teshoa. A discoidal flake or spall knocked from the convex surface of a waterworn stone by a dexterous blow with a hammerstone or by striking a boulder against another stone. This implement was first noted by Leidy, who found it in use among the Shoshoni of Wyoming. Leidy states that "it was called a 'teshoa,' and is employed as a scraper in dressing buffalo skins." The use of sharp-edged flakes of this type for scrapers and knives was doubtless general among the tribes from the earliest times. Consult Leidy in 6th Rep. Hayden Surv. 1872, 653, 1873; Mercer in Proc. A. A. A. S., xli, 287, 1892; Phillips in Smithsonian Rep. 1897, 587, 1898. (W. H. H.)

Tesik. A village occupied by Chukchi and Aiwan Yuit Eskimo, half and half, on the w. shore of Chechin bay, N. E. Siberia. Pop. 142 in 25 houses about 1895; 94 in 18 houses in 1901.

Če'čin.—Bogoras, Chukchee, 29, 1904 (Chukchi name). Te'sik.—Ibid. (Eskimo name). Tsche-tshehn.—Krause in Deutsche Geog. Blätt., v, 80, map, 1882.

Tesinde ('buffalo-tail'). A gens of the Inshtasanda division of the Omaha.

Buffalo.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 155, 1877. Buffalo-tail.—Dorsey in Bull. Philoa. Soc. Wash., 129, 1880. Da-thun'-da.—Morgan, op. cit., 155. Tasin-da.—Long, Exped. Rocky Mts., i, 327, 1823. Je-sinde.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 226, 1897.

Tesonachas. Mentioned by Baudry des Lozières (Voy. à la Louisiane, 244, 1802) in a list of tribes with no information concerning it. Unidentified.

Tessiqdjuak.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1858.

Tessuntee. A former Cherokee settlement on Cowee r., s. of Franklin, in Macon co., N. C.—Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1887.

Testnigh. A village, probably occupied by the Conestoga, situated in 1608 on the E. bank of Susquehanna r., in Lancaster co., Pa.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Testthitua ('where [something] reclined'?). A former village of the Tututni on the N. side of Rogue r., Oreg.

Tê-st'hi'-tân.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 233, 1890.

Tesuque (Têt-su'-ge, 'cottonwood-tree place'). The southernmost of the pueblos occupied by the Tewa; situated 8 m. N. of Santa Fé, N. Mex. It became the seat of a Spanish mission early in the 17th century, but was reduced to a visita of Santa Fé in 1760 and of Pojuaque in 1782. The original pueblo, which bore the same name, occupied a site about 3 m. N. of the present village, and was abandoned probably during the Pueblo revolt of 1680-92. The Tesuque people are divided into two organizations, the Winter (Watuyú) and the Summer (Oy'-ke) people, each with its own cariques. Formerly they adhered strictly to the tribal law which prohibited intermarriage between members of the same clan, but the custom seems no longer to be rigidly followed, and, unlike the Pueblos generally, descent is in the male line. The existing Tesuque clans are: T'ye (Gopher), Tang (Taⁿ, Sun), Kongya (Koⁿya, Turquoise), Owhât (Cloud). The extinct clans are: Ta (Grass), Nang (Naⁿ, Earth), Tee (Eagle), Do (Coyote), Kup-ing (Kupⁿ, Coral), P'o (Calabash). Pop. 80 in 1906. See Pueblos, Tewa. (F.W.H.)

Tet. A tribe named in 1708 in a list of those that had been met or heard of N. of San Juan Bautista mission on the lower Rio Grande, in Texas (Fr. Isidro Felix de Espinosa, Relación Compendiosa of the Rio Grande missions, MS. in the College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro).

Tetachoya. A former Salinan village near San Antonio mission, Monterey co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 27, 1860.

Tetanaucioa. The tribal name given in the records for an Indian who was buried in 1707 at San Francisco Solano mission, Texas. The neophytes gathered there belonged mainly to the Coahuiltecan family, which may be true of this band or tribe (Valero Burials, 1707, partida 82, MS.). (H. B. B.)

Tetanetlenok (T'et'anêlêndr). A gens of the Klaskino, a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 329, 1897.

Tetecores. A former tribe of Coahuila, N. E. Mexico, probably Coahuiltecan, met by Fernando del Bosque in 1675, at which time they and the Babosarigami together numbered 119, including 44 warriors.—Fernando del Bosque (1675) in Nat. Geog. Mag., xiv, 348, 1903.

Têtes de Boule (French: 'round heads'). A rude tribe of wandering hunters formerly roving over an extensive region on the upper branches of St. Maurice, Gatineau, and Ottawa rs., Quebec. As described by Henry, about the year 1800, they depended chiefly on rabbits for food and clothing, built mere brush windbreaks for shelter, and placed small piles of firewood near the bark-covered graves of their dead for the use of the spirits. Chauvignerie

(1736) gives them and the Abittibi as totems the pheasant and the eagle. They have been reduced by smallpox and other calamities to 203, living in 1908 on a reservation on St Maurice r., in Champlain co., Quebec. They seem to be closely cognate with their western neighbors, the Nope-ming (q. v.), with whom they are often confounded, although apparently a distinct people. See Michacondibi, Michipicolen. (J. M.)

Algonquins à têtes de Boule.—Champigny (1692) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 535, 1855. Big-heads.—Donnelly in Can. Ind. Aff. Rep. 1883, pt. i, 10, 1884. Bullheads.—Colden (1727), Five Nations, 134, 1747. Gens des Terres.—Jes. Rel. 1671, 25, 1858. Round Heads.—Durant (1721) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 589, 1855. Testes de bœufs.—La Chesnaye (1697) in Margry, Déc., vi, 6, 1886. Tetes de Boule.—Chauvignerie (1736) quoted by Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 556, 1853.

Têtes Pelées (French: 'bald heads'). Described by the Nipissing as a people with little or no hair, who came into Hudson bay in large wooden boats to trade. Possibly some white traders.

Testes Pelees.—Sagard (1636), Can., i, 227, 1886.

Tetling. A Tenankutchin village, of 17 inhabitants in 1885, on upper Tanana r., Alaska, where the outlet of Wagner lake joins it in lat. 63° 30'. In 1898 it consisted of 4 log houses.

Tetlings.—Lowe quoted by Baker, Geog. Diet. Alaska, 1902. Tetling's village.—Allen, Rep. on Alaska, 137, 1885.

Teton (contr. of Titonwan, 'dwellers on the prairie'). The western and principal division of the Dakota or Sioux, including all the bands formerly ranging w. of Missouri r., and now residing on reservations in South Dakota and North Dakota. The bands officially recognized are. Oglala of Pine Ridge agency; Brulé of Rosebud and Lower Brulé agencies; Blackfoot, Miniconjou, Sans Arc, and Two Kettle of Cheyenne River agency; Hunkpapa, etc., of Standing Rock agency. Their history is interwoven with that of the other Dakota and is little more than a recountal of attacks on other tribes and on border settlers and emigrants. They were first met by Hennepin (1680) 20 or 30 leagues above the falls of St Anthony in Minnesota, probably at Sauk rapids, on Mississippi r., about 70 m. above Minneapolis. He places them in the neighborhood of Mille Lacs, far to the e. of their later home. Lahontan also enumerates them among the tribes on the upper Mississippi, which leads to the conclusion that a part at least of the Teton formerly lived in the prairie region, near the upper Mississippi, though the main body may have been near upper Minnesota r. Le Sueur in 1700 included them in the western Sioux, who lived between the upper Mississippi and the Missouri. On a map of De l'Isle (1701) L. Traverse is surrounded by villages of wandering Teton. Pachot (Margry, Déc., vi, 518, 1886) located them 80 leagues w. of the Falls of St Anthony in 1722. Carver (1766) met at least a part of them at the extreme w. point of his journey up Minnesota r., about 200 m. from its mouth. The younger Henry (Coues, New Light, i, 145, 1897) found them in 1800 on the upper Missouri, where Lewis and Clark (Exped., i, 98, 100, 1893) encountered them a few years afterward. These explorers enumerate as divisions: Tetons of the Burnt Woods (Brulés), about 300 men, who rove on both sides of Missouri, White, and Teton rs.; Tetons Okandandas (Oglala), 150 men, who inhabit both sides of the Missouri below Cheyenne r.; Tetons Minnekineazzo, about 250 men, on both sides of the Missouri above Cheyenne r.; Tetons Saone, about 300 men, living on both sides of Missouri r. below Beaver cr. Gov. Ramsey said that they lived from Cannonball r. s. to Niobrara r. (Rep. Ind. Aff. 1849, 84, 1850).

The Teton entered into a peace treaty with the United States at Portage des Sioux, Mo., in 1815, which was confirmed by treaty of June 22, 1825, at Ft Lookout, S. Dak. It was warriors of this group who massacred Lieut. Grattan and his party at Ft Laramie, Wyo., in 1854; none, however, took part in the Minnesota massacre of 1862. In 1865 a commission concluded treaties with each of the several divisions of the group, with provision for right of way through their territory. By treaty of 1868 they first agreed to give up their free range and come upon a reservation, including about all of South Dakota w. of the Missouri r. Under their chiefs, Red Cloud, Crazy Horse, and Sitting Bull, they have been the principals in all the Indian wars and outbreaks of the northern plains, notably in 1864, 1876, and 1890.

Gov. Ramsey characterizes the Teton as a large, finely formed, tall, and vigorous people, hardy, indomitable, and restless warriors, daring horsemen, and skilful hunters, possessing in perfection "all the Indian virtues of bravery, cunning, treachery, and hospitality," true to each other and ready foes to all others.

Neill (Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., i, 258, 1872) says: "They are the plundering Arabs of America, and have of late years been a terror to the emigrants to the Pacific coast." According to Lewis and Clark the interior policing of a village was confided to 2 or 3 officers who were named by the chief for the purpose of preserving order and remained in power some days, till the chief appointed their successors. These were always on the watch to keep tranquillity during the day and guarded the camp at night. The short duration of their office was compensated by its authority, their power being supreme, and in the suppression of disturbance no resistance to them was suffered; their persons were sacred, and if in the execution of their duty they even struck a chief of the second class they could not be punished. Riggs mentions as peculiarities of the Teton dialect, compared with those of other divisions of the Dakota group, that g hard is used for h of the Santee and k of the Yanktonai, and that, rejecting d altogether, they use l in its stead.

The Teton is the most populous and important of the Dakota divisions, constituting four-sevenths of the whole nation. Lewis and Clark (1804) estimated them at 1,000 men, about 4,000 souls, probably much less than the true number. The Indian Bureau in 1842 estimated the total number at 12,000; Ramsey (1849), more than 6,000; Riggs (1851), fewer than 12,500. The Indian Bureau in 1861 gave a total of 8,900. It is probable these estimates were below rather than above the true number, as in 1890 the total Teton population was 16,426, and in 1909 the number, including Yanktonai bands at Standing Rock agency, N. Dak., was 18,098. In addition about 100 of the Sitting Bull refugees are still in Canada. (C. T.)

Tewa ('moccasins,' their Keresan name). A group of Pueblo tribes belonging to the Tanoan linguistic family, now occupying the villages of San Ildefonso, San Juan, Santa Clara, Nambe, Tesuque, and Hano, all except the last lying in the valley of the Rio Grande in N. New Mexico. The pueblo of Hano, in the Hopi country of N. E. Arizona, dates from the time of the Pueblo revolt of 1680-92. Pojoaque was inhabited by Tewa until a few years ago, when intermarriage with Mexicans and the death of the few full-bloods made it practically a Mexican settlement. It had been supposed that the Tano, an offshoot of the Tewa in prehistoric times, spoke a dialect distinct from that of the Tewa, but recent studies by John P. Harrington show that the differences are so slight as to be negligible. In 1598 Juan de Oñate named 11 of the Tewa pueblos and stated that there were others; 30 years later Fray Alonso Benavides reported the population to be 6,000 in 8 pueblos. The population of the present 6 villages is about 1,200—San Juan, the largest, having 419, and Tesuque, the smallest, 86 inhabitants. Each village of the Tewa is divided into two sections, the Winter people and the Summer people. According to Bandelier, "the dignity of chief penitent or cacique belongs alternately to each of these two groups. Thus the Summer cacique serves from the vernal equinox to the autumnal, and the Winter cacique from the autumnal to the vernal equinox. On very important occasions, however, the Oyiké or Winter cacique is inferior to his colleague." Little is yet known of the social organization and religious institutions of the Tewa people, but there is evidence that at Nambe and Tesuque, at least, descent is reckoned in the male line, and that at the latter pueblo the law prohibiting marriage of persons belonging to the same clan is no longer strictly enforced.

Following are the villages formerly occupied by the Tewa, so far as the names have been recorded or applied: Abechui, Agawano, Analco, Axol, Camitria, Chipinuinge, Chipiwi, Chupadero, Cuyamunque, Fejiu, Fesere, Homayo, Houiri, Ihamba, Jacona, Junetre, Kaayu, Keguayo, Kuapooqe, Kwengyauinge, Luceiros (partially), Navahu, Navawi, Otowi, Perage, Pininicanwi, Pojiuuingge, Pojoaque, Ponyinumba, Ponyipakuen, Poseuingge, Potzuye, Pueblito, Pueblo Quemado (?), Puye, Sajiuingge, Sakeyu, Sandia (not the Tigua pueblo of that name), Santa Cruz, Sepawi, Shufinne, Teeuinggee, Tejeuingge Ouiping, Tobhipangge, Triapi, Triaque, Troomaxiaquino, Tsankawi, Tsawarii, Tseweige, Tshirege, Yugeuingge.

The following extinct villages were either Tewa or Tano: Chiuma, Guia, Guika, Peñas Negras.

The following were inhabited by either the Tigua or the Tewa: Axoytre, Camitre, Paniete, Piamato, Quioyaco.

Texas. A name variously applied by writers, but most commonly used by the Spaniards, from whom French and English writers borrowed it, to designate the Hasinai tribes of Angelina and upper Neches valleys, Texas. There are many variations from this usage in Spanish writings, but nevertheless it is the usual one. As a geographical term the name was first extended from these Hasinai tribes to their immediate country, and then gradually to all the territory included within the present Texas.

Among the tribes of E. Texas the word texas (texias, thecas?, techan, teysas, techas?, etc., pronounced, there is reason to suspect, as indicated by the last spelling) had wide currency before the coming of the Spaniards. Its usual meaning there was 'friends,' or, more technically, 'allies', and it was used, by the Hasinai at least (to whom the word later became fastened as a name), to designate a large group of tribes, both Caddoan and others, customarily allied against the Apache. The Hasinai seem not to have applied the term to themselves as a local group name at all. On the other hand, they did use it as an everyday form of greeting, like "Hello, friend!" (Testimony given at the Nabadache village, 1692, in the Terán Autos, Archivo Gen., Prov. Intern., CLXXXII). The Spanish narrowing of the term, as a group name, to the Hasinai, is due mainly to the historical circumstance that the Hasinai were the first of the great group of allies, or texas, whom they came to know intimately. They were influenced in the first place, however, by an apparent but unexplained partial narrowing of the term by the Indians of w. Texas from whom they first heard it.

Just when and how the name Texas first reached the Spaniards is uncertain, but it is known that in the 17th century there grew up in New Spain the notion of a "great kingdom of Texas," coextensive and even associated with that of a "Gran Quivira" (see Quivira). Passing by earlier notices, the idea is well illustrated by a report sent in 1683 to the viceroy of New Spain by the governor of New Mexico. Governor Cruzate wrote from El Paso del Norte that a Jumano (Tawehash (?) Indian from the mouth of the Conchos, called Juan Sabeata, had just come and told him of many tribes to the eastward who had sent to ask for missionaries. Among them was the "Gran Reyno de los Texas," situated 15 or 16 days journey from the informant's home. This populous country, which was ruled by a powerful "king," was next-door neighbor to Gran Quivira, so close indeed that the people of the two realms visited back and forth almost daily. Cruzate asked permission to embrace this rare opportunity to send an expedition to the interior, adding that he would be highly gratified if, through his efforts, "another New World" should be discovered, and "two realms with two more crowns" added to the king's dominions (Cruzate to the Viceroy, Oct. 30, 1683, MS.). The desired expedition was sent out in the same year under Domingo de Mendoza, but, although it penetrated far into the interior (reaching the Colorado near Ballinger), it failed to reach the great kingdom of the Texas (Diary of Mendoza, 1683-84, MS.). As conceived of by Juan Sabeata, the Jumano, and by Mendoza, this "kingdom" was apparently localized indefinitely to some place e. of that reached by the expedition, and applied to settled Indians who practised agriculture extensively.

Massanet, the father of the Texas missions, tells us that it was the stories of Gran Quivira and of "the kingdoms of Tielas, Theas, and Caburcol," handed down from the mouth of the venerable María de Jesus de Ágreda, that attracted him from Spain to the American wilds; and when in 1689 he went with De León to find La Salle's establishment he was preoccupied with these names and fabulous nations. On the way, while still w. of the Hasinai country, they were greeted by Indians who proclaimed themselves thecas, 'friends,' as Massanet understood the word, which may or may not be the same as texas. E. of the Colorado they were met by the chief of the Nabadache, the westernmost of the Hasinai tribes, and in the next year they established a mission near this chief's village, w. of Neches r. Judging from the reports of the then recent La Salle expedition, and of most subsequent expeditions, they must have heard while there the native group-name Hasinai; but both Massanet and De León, with preconceived notions, it would seem, of a "great kingdom of the Texas," and thinking they had found it, wrote of this chief as the "governor," and of his people as the very Texas who had been visited by the venerable María de Jesus (Massanet, letter, in Tex. Hist. Quar., II, 282-312; De León, Derrotero, 1689, MS. in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii; Derrotero, 1690, MS. in Archivo Gen.).

That, from the standpoint of the natives whom Massanet had visited, both of these designations were misleading, was soon shown by a careful observer. Francisco de Jesus María, a missionary left by Massanet among the Nabadache, wrote, after more than a year's residence at his mission, his precious report of Aug. 15, 1691. In it he emphatically asserted that, contrary to prevailing notions, the Indians about him did not constitute a kingdom, that the chief called "governor" by the Spaniards was not the head chief, and that the correct name of the group of tribes was not Texas. Texias, he explained, means 'friends,' and is a general name applying to a large group of tribes, some 50 or more in number, who are customarily allied. "The reason why the name is common to all is their long-continued friendship. Hence Texias meant friends." The Texias have no king, and not even a common government, he continues, but belong to various "provinces" or confederacies, with 4 or 5 tribes each. Hereupon he enumerates the tribes comprising the Texias, giving a list (obtained, he says, from the Hasinai and the Kadobadacho) of 48 tribes, exclusive of some of the Hasinai. Twenty-one of these were n. and e. of the mission from which he wrote. Five of these 21 composed the "very large province" of "los Caddodachos." Eighteen were to the s. w. and 9 to the s. e. One tribe, the Chuman, we recognize as the Jumano, or Jumane, of the Rio Grande country. It would seem from this that the Jumano and the Hasinai, for quite different reasons, referred to each other as Texas, although neither claimed the name for themselves. Continuing, our author tells us that the correct name of the confederacy occupying the valleys of the upper Neches and the Angelina, "which in New Spain they call Texias," is "Aseney" or "Asenay."

Texas or Terias seems to be essentially correct, for it is supported by an abundance of both positive and negative testimony and is contradicted by little or none. Only a small portion of this testimony can be included here.

To begin with, it is significant that the several chroniclers of the La Salle expeditions to the tribes in question did not once, so far as is known, use the name Texas in their voluminous reports, but called the two main Caddoan groups which they encountered the Cenis (Hasinai) and Cadoaquious. This difference from the reports of Massanet and De León is attributed to the fact that the La Salle party were ignorant of the Mexican rumors about the "Gran Reyno de los Texas." Of the French explorers who reported on the Indians of N. E. Texas after La Salle's expeditions and before St Denis went to Mexico (1715), none, it is believed, used the name Texas for the Hasinai. The list includes Tonti, the Talons left by Joutel, Iberville, Bienville, and Pénicaut (Tonti in French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 74, 1846; the Talons in Margry, Déc., iii, 610-21, 1878; Iberville and Bienville, ibid., iv, 331, 336, 401, 432-34, 1880; Pénicaut, ibid., v, 499-502, 1883).

Returning to positive evidence, Terán, who led the first Spanish expedition after that of De León, set out, as he said, to explore further the "kingdom of Texas," but before he returned he abandoned the name Texas, except as an alternative, or as an official designation fixed by his instructions. As he approached the frontier of the Hasinai country he considered it necessary to explain that "this nation is called by the natives Asinay, and Texia, which in their language means friends"; and after reaching the Neches he at least eight times refers to the immediate group of tribes as Asinay, but not once does he call them Texas (Descripción y Diaria Demarcación, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 21-71, passim). This is enough to show that after he reached the ground his conversion from "Texas" to "Hasinai" was complete. But there is still stronger evidence. All through the voluminous autos of the Terán expedition, "Hasinai" is used to the exclusion of Texas as a tribal name. Once the usage of Texas is explained. Here several of the companions of Terán give, under oath, the opinion that the "Nation Asinay" cannot be the kingdom of Texas told of by the venerable María de Jesus de Agreda. That kingdom must be sought farther N., beyond the Kadohadacho. As to the name Texas, they declare that "the said nation Asinay in their own language call one another, and even us, Texas, which means 'friends.' The name of the nation is Asinay. All these nations commonly use the same word to call each other friends. This is so well understood from having seen it and experienced it when, talking with them, they wished to salute" (Autos of the Terán expedition, op. cit.).

One other explanation of what is apparently the same word, Texas, deserves especially to be noted, because it makes clearer its more technical usage in the sense of "allies," and also reveals the persistence of its usage in this sense by the natives during a century of contact with French and Spaniards. In 1778 Atanacio de Mezières, in his day and section the dean of Indian agents, wrote that the best way to bring the Comanche to Spanish allegiance would be to attach them, in the honorable position of allies, to a campaign which he was proposing to make against the Apache in company with the principal tribes of N. E. Texas; "because," he explained, "from such a custom comes the name of Techán among the natives, which suggests [alude á] that of commilito [companion in arms], with which the Romans flattered themselves, and which results among the Indians in a close bond of friendship between those who call themselves by it, and in the vulgar opinion that no one may break it without fearing and incurring the penalty which perjurers merit" (Letter to Croix, Feb. 20, 1778, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 235). Mezières' customary use of accent marks makes it seem probable that the one he puts in Techán is to indicate the quality of the vowel, and not stress of voice.

That the name locally applied to the Neches-Angelina group of tribes was Hasinai, or Asinai, there seems little room for doubt; and the above explanations of the meaning and usages of Texas, given by our best qualified witnesses, are, to say the least, probably the most satisfactory we are likely to have. The meanings 'land of flowers', 'paradise', 'tiled roofs', etc., sometimes given for the word, have never been even suggested, so far as known, by first-hand observers. They seem to be fictions of recent date.

Through an erroneous preconception, Texas became the official Spanish designation of the Hasinai people and their country. While eyewitnesses continued to insist that Hasinai was the correct name, the authorities in Mexico continued to designate them as the Texas, narrowing the name commonly to the Neches-Angelina group, whose most prominent tribes were the Nabedache, Nacogdoche, Neche, Hainai, Nasoni, and Nadaco (q. v.). Owing to the fact that the Hainai were the head tribe of the confederacy, Texas was sometimes, in later Spanish days, confined to it. For the same reason the name Hasinai was sometimes restricted to this tribe. In 1822 Morse (Rep. to Sec. War, 373) applied the term Texas exclusively to the Nabedache village, which still occupied its primitive site on the "Nechez, at the junction of the Bayou St Pedro." In 1834 Col. Almonte seems to have applied it to all the survivors of the old Hasinai group except the Nacogdoches (Noticia Estadística, table 3, 1835). (H. E. B.)

The elements are t for te 'two'; ha 'he-it'; yenda 'a wager'; -nē'kēn' 'set side by side iteratively'). A celebrated Mohawk chief, popularly known as Joseph Brant, who took an active part against the white settlers in the border wars during the Revolution, and who first came into official notice as a so-called "Pine-tree chief." He was born on the Ohio in 1742 while his parents were on a hunting expedition to that section. The home of his family was at Canajoharie Castle in the Mohawk valley, N. Y. His father, Tehowaghwenagaraghkwīn, according to Stone, was a full-blood Mohawk of the Wolf gens, and his mother was also Indian or at least a half-blood. While Joseph was still young his father died, and the mother then married an Indian known among the whites as Brant: hence the name by which Brant is commonly known. His sister Molly, the elder child, became the acknowledged wife, according to the Indian method, of Sir William Johnson. Thayendanegaa's career as a warrior began at the age of 13, when he joined the Indians under Sir William Johnson at the battle of L. George in

1755. Johnson sent him to Dr Wheelock's charity school at Lebanon, Conn., where he learned to speak and write English, and acquired some knowledge of general literature and history. He married the daughter of an Oneida chief about 1765, and settled at Canajoharie, where he joined the Episcopal Church and for a time led a peaceful life. His wife died in 1771, leaving a son and a daughter; in the year following he married his first wife's half-sister. He was with Johnson in the Niagara expedition of 1759, and took part in the Pontiac war of 1763, fighting on the English side. Having visited England in 1775, he returned prepared to devote his energies to the British cause in the Revolution, then imminent. He was given a colonel's commission by Gov. Carleton, and sullied his name by taking an active part in the massacre at Cherry valley and in the raid that desolated Minisink, Orange co., in 1779. He was conspicuous in the battle of Oriskany, Aug. 6, 1779, but was not present at the massacre of Wyoming in 1778, as has been charged. After the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States in 1783, still retaining his commission in the British service and drawing half pay, Brant was granted a tract of land, 6 in. wide, on each side of Grand r., Ontario, on which he settled with his Mohawk and other Iroquois followers, and continued to rule over them until his death, Nov. 24, 1807. He was thrice married; his second wife died childless, but by his third wife he had seven children. His youngest son, John (Ah-youwaighs), became chief of the Mohawk tribe through his mother, who was the eldest daughter of the head chief of the Turtle gens. His daughter Elizabeth married William Johnson Kerr, grandson of Sir William Johnson. The last survivor of the Brant children was Catherine B. Johnson, who died in 1867. Thayendanegea was buried near the little church he had built on Grand r., 3 m. from Brantford, Ontario, and a monument placed over his grave bears the inscription, "This tomb is erected to the memory of Thayendanegea or Capt. Joseph Brant, principal chief and warrior of the Six Nations Indians, by his fellow-subjects, admirers of his fidelity and attachment to the British Crown." In 1879 the grave was desecrated and the bones were stolen by a physician and medical students, but most of them, including the skull, were recently restored to their former resting place. Consult Stone, Life of Brant, 1864. (J. N. B. H.)

who dwell on the shores of Lacrosse lake and in the country between Cold lake and Ft Locha, Athabasca Ter., Canada. Ross (MS., B. A. E.) gives their habitat as extending from Churchill r. to Athabasca and Great Slave lakes. Kennicott (MS., B. A. E.) states that they extend as far N. as Ft Resolution on the S. shore of Great Slave lake. The Thilanottine are of good stature, having well-proportioned bodies, long narrow heads, flat faces, high cheek-bones, and depressed temples, giving the head a marked pear shape. Their hands and feet are unusually small and well formed. They are mild-mannered and docile, selfish, and grasping, great liars, but otherwise noted for honesty. Polygamy exists, but is not common. A Roman Catholic mission was established among them in 1856, and their native beliefs and customs have been influenced thereby; otherwise they do not differ materially from the tribes on the N. Their snowshoes are of superior workmanship, the inner part of the frames being straight, the outer edge curved, and both ends pointed, the one in front being turned upward. The lacing is neatly made of deerskin thongs. Their sledges are made of thin strips of red spruce-fir turned up in front and highly polished with a crooked knife to make them run easily. In 1859 the tribe numbered 211, of whom 100 were males and 111 females. In 1902 there were 253—53 adult men, 73 adult women, and 127 children and young people, attached to Onion Lake agency—living in better built houses than the Cree, and engaged in hunting, fishing, and raising cattle, the women doing the farm work, and all enjoying a good reputation for piety, morality, and temperance. Another band of 70—composed of 13 men, 20 women, and 37 children—lived entirely by hunting, trapping, and fishing in the district surrounding Heart lake (Can. Ind. Rep., 169, 1902). The Thilanottine have a legend of the Metal Woman, differing from that of the Taltsanottine. A giant in the time when there were giants encountered another on the shore of the Arctic ocean and a fierce combat resulted, in which he would have succumbed had not a man whom he had befriended cut the tendon of his adversary's leg, causing him to fall so as to form a bridge across Bering strait, over which the reindeer entered America, and later a strange woman came, bringing iron and copper. She repeated her visits until her beneficiaries offered her violence once, whereupon she went underground with her treasure to come back no more.

Thlingchadinne ('dog-flank people'). An Athapascan tribe or group of tribes. Their habitat, according to Dobbs (1744), was on Seal r., in the muskox country. They did not trade with the French because they were afraid to go through the territory of the hostile Maskegon. La Potherie in 1753 located them at the sources of Churchill r. Jefferys in 1761 placed them near Hudson bay n. of their foes, the Maskegon. Franklin in 1824 found them between the Tatsanottine country and Mackenzie r. Back (1835) said that they were in the barren lands about Great Slave lake. Dunn (1844) gave their habitat as Mackenzie r. and Great Bear lake. According to Richardson (1851) they occupied the inland country, e. of the Kawchodinne, from L. La Martre to Coppermine r. Hind in 1863 located them about the n. and n. e. parts of Great Slave lake, resorting to Ft Rae and Ft Simpson. Petitot (Diet. Dènè Dindjié, xx, 1876) gave their habitat as being between Great Slave and Great Bear lakes, e. of Mackenzie r., extending as far as Coppermine r. Expelled from their pristine home by their Cree enemies, they have migrated continuously northward during two centuries. Franklin, Dease, and Simpson found them n. and n. e. of Great Bear lake between 1819 and 1836. Since then they have returned to some of the southern districts. Petitot found Great Slave lake their extreme southern limit.

According to a fable told by the Chipewyan, Tatsanottine, and Kawchodinne, as well as by the Thlingchadinne themselves, the tribe originated from the union of a supernatural dog-man with a Tinne woman. After the discovery of copper by a Tatsanottine woman another woman of the same tribe was dwelling with her two brothers n. of Great Slave lake. One day a strong and handsome stranger arrived, who, on the proposal of the brothers, took her for his wife. Waking in the middle of the wedding night she found her husband gone and heard an animal crunching bones at the fireplace. (There were no dogs then among the Tatsanottine; Franklin found them without these animals in 1820.) The same thing happened the next night. The bride and her brothers lighted torches, but found no animal. On the third night one of the brothers hurled a stone ax into the corner whence the noise of gnawing proceeded. A cry of agony was heard, and when a torch was lighted a great black dog was seen twitching in the death throes. As the human husband did not reappear, the brothers chased forth their sister because she had married a dog-man, a sorcerer, a Tlingit. She wandered into the treeless desert of Coppermine r., where in the course of time she brought forth a litter of puppies, which she kept hidden in a bag of reindeer skin. When they could run alone she was astonished to find on her return from hunting, prints of infants' feet in the ashes. Hiding one day, she saw the little dogs leap from the bag, becoming handsome children as soon as they reached the light. She ran and pulled the string of the bag, but not before three succeeded in jumping back into the dark hole. Two boys and two girls were kept forcibly in the daylight, and these became the progenitors of the Thlingchadinne (Petitot, Autour du Lac des Esclaves, 296, 1891).

Ross (MS., B. A. E.) states that adjoining the Tatsanottine are the Dog-ribs, whose lands extend from Coppermine r. to the s. e. side of Great Bear lake and to about midway between L. La Martre and Mackenzie r. In the latter tract they are much intermingled with the Etchareottine, from whom they can scarcely be distinguished except by their larger stature and their thick, stuttering, and disagreeable manner of enunciation. Petitot describes them as tall and well built, of a bronze or terra-cotta color, nervous of temperament, their hands and feet small and well modeled, the chest wide and deep, with black hair and eyes, heavy eyelids, a sad and reserved look, large mouths, full lips, furnished with slender moustaches on the men, sometimes accompanied by thin beards, their countenances having a peculiar Egyptian cast. The same author (Bull. Soc. Géog. Paris, chart, 1875) divides them into Takfwelottine, Lintchanre, Tseottine, and Tsantieottine. The Thlingchadinne subsist chiefly on the reindeer. They are said to treat their women and dogs with more kindness and consideration than do the Chipewyan tribes. The father loses his name on the birth of a child and is thereafter known as the father of so-and-so, the child. Other tribes of this group have the same custom, but these people change the name after the birth of every child, while an unmarried man is called the father of his favorite dog. Ross in 1858 gave their population as 926, of whom 533 were men and 393 were women; of this number 23 were found at Ft Resolution on Great Slave lake, 150 at Ft Simpson, and 133 at Ft Norman. Father Morice in 1906 gave the total number of Dog-ribs as 1,150.

Throwing stick. This implement, called also throwing board, dart sling, and atlatl, is an apparatus for hurling a lance, spear, or harpoon at birds and aquatic animals. It measures from 16 to 20 in., with extremes from 8 to 30 in. The essential parts are (1) the body; (2) the groove on the upper side for the spear shaft, not always present; (3) the grip, the part held in the hand for throwing; and (4) a hook, hole, or socket to fit the end or the shaft of the projectile. The materials, forms, and the presence or absence of some of the parts are sure marks by which throwing sticks of different areas can be distinguished. This sling device was widely diffused about the shores of the Pacific. It was used by all the Eskimo tribes, also in s. e. Alaska, the Interior Basin, California, and Florida. The body may be in form a rod, a double cone, or a broad piece of wood. The grip may be the natural form of the stick, or this may be furnished with holes, pockets, pegs, loops, or notches, alone or combined, to insure a firmer grasp, as was especially the case with the throwing sticks of the arctic region. The groove, when present, is either rounded or squared, and it serves as a rest for the shaft between the fingers and the butt end of the body. The end of the spear is loosely attached to the stick in three ways: (1) by a shallow socket which fits on a spur, (2) by a socket at the end of the stick into which fits a conical projection on the spear shaft, or, (3) as in Greenland, by pegs on the harpoon shaft that fit into holes in the throwing stick. This device attained the highest perfection among the Mexicans and Peruvians, whose atlatl was raised to the dignity of a fighting weapon.

ESKIMO THROWING STICK

The throwing stick, the varieties of which are endless, added an extra joint to the arm and thus multiplied its efficiency in hurling; it could be used in places where the bow would be impracticable, as in a canoe or where only one hand would be available, also among marshy growth; and it propelled a missile many times heavier than an arrow. The thrower held the grip by his right hand, the thumb turned inward; fitted the butt end of the projectile to the hook, socket, or hole in the outer end of the throwing stick; laid the shaft of the weapon in the groove, holding it down with three fingers, and placed the whole against the right shoulder, point forward, ready to drive the weapon at the game by a propulsive thrust. When the missile struck the animal it held the latter by means of a toggle or barbs, which retarded its progress and helped to bring it in, the whole apparatus being one of the most complicated and ingenious devices of savagery. See Lance.

Thunder Bay. A Chippewa or Ottawa band formerly living on Thunder bay, in Alpena co., Mich.—Detroit treaty (1855) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 615, 1873.

Thunderbird. Thunder and lightning were usually supposed to be produced by a being or a number of beings different from all others. On the great plains, where the phenomena of thunderstorms are very striking, and northwestward to the Pacific coast, as well as through the Canadian forest area to the Atlantic, they were supposed to be caused by birds of enormous size, which produced thunder by flapping their wings and the lightning by opening and closing their eyes. The great downpour which generally accompanies thunder was often accounted for by supposing that the bird carries a lake of fresh water on its back. The Mandan supposed that it was because the thunderbird broke through the clouds, the bottom of the skyey reservoir (Maximilian, Trav., 361, 1843). Sometimes only one thunderbird is spoken of, and sometimes a family of them, or else several adults of different colors. Although the species of this bird is often quite indefinite, on the N. Pacific coast it is conceived of as similar to, if not identical with, a large hawk found in the high mountains, while other people likened it to an eagle, and the Ntlakyapamuk of British Columbia thought it resembled a grouse. On the plains a thunderstorm was supposed to be due to a contest between the thunderbird and a huge rattlesnake, or an underground or subaqueous monster—called Unktéhi by the Dakota—and certain writers have unwarrantably deduced a mystic significance from this, such as the war between light and darkness or good and evil. On the N. Pacific coast a thunderbird was supposed to be catching whales during a thunderstorm, and persons profess to have seen whales dropped into trees with the marks of talons on them. According to the Ntlakyapamuk the thunderbird uses its wings as a bow to shoot arrows. "The rebound of his wings in the air, after shooting, makes the thunder. For this reason thunder is heard in different parts of the sky at once, being the noise from each wing. The arrowheads fired by the thunder are found in many parts of the country. They are of black stone and of very large size" (Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 338, 1900). The thunderbird was naturally held in awe, and a person who had been struck by lightning and recovered became an efficient shaman. (J. R. S.)

Tigua (Spanish form of Ti'wan, pl. Ti-wesh' (Span. Tiguex), their own name). A group of Pueblo tribes comprising three geographic divisions, one occupying Taos and Picuris (the most northerly of the New Mexican pueblos) on the upper waters of the Rio Grande; another inhabiting Sandia and Isleta, n. and s. of Albuquerque, respectively; the third division living in the pueblos of Isleta del Sur, Texas, and Senecu del Sur, Chihuahua, on the lower Rio Grande. At the time of Coronado's visit to New Mexico in 1540-42 the Tigua inhabited Taos and Picuris in the n., and, as to-day, were separated from the middle group by the Tano, the Tewa, and the Rio Grande Queres (Keresan). The villages of this middle group in the 16th century extended from a short distance above Bernalillo to the neighborhood of Los Lunas and over an area e. of the Rio Grande near the salt lagoons of the Manzano, in a territory known as the Salinas, from Chilili to Quarai. The pueblos in the s., near El Paso, were not established until late in the 17th century. The Tigua were first made known to history through Coronado's expedition in 1540, whose chroniclers describe their territory, the province of Tiguex; on the Rio Grande, as containing 12 pueblos on both sides of the river, and the people as possessing corn, beans, melons, skins, and long robes of feathers and cotton. The Spaniards were received by them with friendliness, but when it was decided to spend the winter of 1540-41 in Tiguex province, and the Spaniards demanded of the natives "about 300 or more pieces of cloth" with which to clothe the army, even stripping the cloaks and blankets from their backs, the Indians avenged this and other outrages by running off the Spanish horse herd, of which they killed a large number, and fortifying themselves in one of their pueblos. This the Spaniards attacked, and after exchanging signs of peace the Indians put down their arms and were pardoned. Nevertheless, through some misunderstanding the Spaniards proceeded to burn at the stake 200 of the captives, of whom about half were shot down in an attempt to escape the torture to which the others were being subjected. Says Castañeda, the principal chronicler of the expedition: "Not a man of them remained alive, unless it was some who remained hidden in the village and escaped that night to spread throughout the country the news that the strangers did not respect the peace they had made." As a result of this ill-treatment the Tigua abandoned all but two of their villages, one of which was also known to the Spaniards as Tiguex (see Puaray), into which they took all their stores and equipped themselves for the inevitable siege. Every overture made by the Spaniards toward peace was now received with derision by the natives, who informed them that they "did not wish to trust themselves to people who had no regard for friendship or their own word which they had pledged." One of the Tigua villages was surrounded and attacked by means of ladders, but time and again the Spaniards were beaten off, 50 being wounded in the first assault. During the siege, which lasted 50 days, the Indians lost 200 of their number and surrendered 100 women and children. Finally, the water supply of the natives became exhausted, and in an attempt to leave the village at night and cross the river with the remainder of their women, "there were few who escaped being killed or wounded." The other pueblo suffered the same fate, but its inhabitants apparently did not withstand the siege so long. In attempting to escape, the Spaniards pursued "and killed large numbers of them." The soldiers then plundered the town and captured about 100 women and children.

In 1581 Chamuscado, with 8 soldiers and 7 Indian servants, accompanied the Franciscan missionaries, Agustin Rodriguez, Francisco Lopez, and Juan de Santa María, to the country of the Tigua, but all three were killed by the Indians after the departure of the escort. In 1583 Antonio de Espejo with 14 Spanish followers journeyed to New Mexico, and on his approach the Indians of Puaray, where Rodriguez and Lopez had been killed, fled for fear of vengeance. This was the pueblo, Espejo learned, at which Coronado had lost 9 men and 40 horses, thus identifying it with one of the Tigua villages besieged by Coronado 40 years before. In 1591 Castaño de Sosa also visited the Tigua, as did Oñate in 1598, the latter discovering on a wall at Puaray a partially effaced native painting representing the killing of the three missionaries.

In 1629, according to Benavides, the Tigua province extended over 11 or 12 leagues along the Rio Grande and consisted of 8 pueblos, with 6,000 inhabitants. This reduction in the number of villages was doubtless due to the effort of the Spanish missionaries, soon after the beginning of the 17th century, to consolidate the settlements both to insure greater security from the predatory Apache and to facilitate missionary work. Thus, in 1680, the time of the beginning of the Pueblo revolt, the Tigua occupied only the pueblos of Puaray, Sandia, Alameda, and Isleta, all on the Rio Grande. The population of these towns at the date named was estimated by Vetancurt at 200, 3,000, 300, and 2,000, respectively.

The eastern portion of what was the southern area of the Tigua up to about 1674 was limited to a narrow strip along the eastern slope of the Manzano mts., beginning with the pueblo of Chilili in the n., including Tajique and possibly a pueblo near the present Manzano (q. v.), and ending with Quarai. In this area in 1581, according to Chamuscado, were 11 pueblos. To the E., however, lay a country bountifully supplied with game, including the buffalo, while round about the settlements in every direction were the saline lagoons from which this section of country derives its name and from which salt was obtained for barter with tribes as far s. as Parral in Chihuahua. Yet the aborigines were beset with many disadvantages. Their range was for the greater part an inhospitable desert, exposed to the depredations of the ever-wily Apache, whose constant raids resulted first in the abandonment of Chilili between 1669 and 1674, then Quarai, about 1674, its inhabitants joining those of Tajique pueblo, which a year later was also permanently abandoned. Most of these villagers of the Salinas fled for safety to their kindred at Isleta on the Rio Grande, where they remained until 1680. At this date began the Pueblo revolt against Spanish authority, in which participated the Tigua of Taos and Picuris, as well as of Isleta, Sandia, Alameda, and Puaray. On the appearance of Gov. Otermin in his attempted reconquest of the country in the following year all these pueblos except Isleta were abandoned and were afterward burned by the Spaniards. Isleta was stormed and about 500 of the inhabitants were made captives, most of whom were taken to El Paso and afterward settled in the pueblo of Isleta del Sur, Texas. Of the remainder of the population of Isleta del Norte and Sandia a large portion fled to Tusayan, where they lived with the Hopi until 1709 or 1718, when the Isletaños returned and reestablished their pueblo. The Sandia Indians, however, who numbered 441, appear to have remained with the Hopi, in a pueblo called Payupki on the Middle mesa, until 1742, when they were taken by Padres Delgado and Pino to the Rio Grande and settled in a new pueblo at or near the site of their old one. Alameda and Puaray were never reestablished as Indian pueblos.

The following are the Tigua pueblos, so far as known; of these only Isleta, Isleta del Sur, Picuris, Sandia, Senecu del Sur, and Taos are now inhabited: Alameda, Bejuituuy, Carfaray, Chilili, Isleta (N. Mex.), Isleta del Sur, Kuaua, Lentos, Manzano, Mojualuna, Nabatutuei, Natchurituei, Pahquetooai, Picuris, Puaray, Puretnay, Quarai, San Antonio, Sandia, Santiago, Senecu del Sur (includes also Piro), Shumnac, Tajique, Taos.

The following pueblos, now extinct, were probably also Tigua: Acacafui, Gawayotri, Henicohio, Leyva, Paniete, Poxen, Ranchos, Shinana, Tanques, Torreon, Trimati, Tuchiamas, Vareato.

For pueblos pertaining to either the Piro or the Tigua, see Piro, and for those inhabited by either the Tigua or the Tewa, see Tewa. See also Pueblos, Tanoan Family. (F. W. H.)

Tikumigizhik ('He-takes-cross-cuts-in-the-sky,' lit., He is traveling in the sky, and instead of taking the long way round, goes directly across). An influential full-blood chief of a band of about a hundred Chippewa at White Earth, Minn.; born at Gull Lake about 1830, removed to White Earth about 1868, where he became a Christian under the influence of Enmegahbowh. His progressiveness is shown by the fact that he once had 40 acres in wheat and other grains—more than any other full-blood Chippewa. He is a man of keen penetration, undemonstrative, and shrewd. He was a supporter of Hole-in-the-Day in the Minnesota outbreak of 1862, and saw the soldiers placed in a position where they were at the mercy of the Indians; but, as Tikumigizhik expresses it, he and his tribesmen thought of all the widows and orphans that would be made, so they refrained from making an onslaught. Tikumigizhik's sister was the wife of Nebuneshkung. (J. A. G.)

Tikwalitsi (Tikwāli'tsi, of unknown meaning). A former important Cherokee town on Tuckasegee r., at the present Bryson City, Swain co., N. C. The name appears in old documents as Tuckarechee (lower dialect) and Tuckalegee, and must not be confounded with Tsiksi'tsi or Tuckasegee.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 534, 1900.

Tilapani. A village or tribe marked on De l'Isle's map of about 1700 (Winsor, Hist. Am., II, 294, 1886), near Atchafalaya bayou, La. Nothing is known of its affiliations, but as the locality given was within the Chitimacha country, it may have belonged to that group.

Tilijaes. One of the Coahuiltecan tribes mentioned by Fray Bartolomé García as speaking the language of his Manual (1760). Orozco y Berra (Geog., 304, 1864) places them on Nueces r., Texas, immediately below the Pampopa, who were 22 leagues from San Juan Bautista mission. He also (p. 302) speaks of them as gathered with other tribes at missions in Coahuila about 1675–77. They were among the original tribes at San Juan Capistrano mission in 1731, and from the time of its founding they were at San Juan Bautista mission. When García wrote they were still in part at San Juan Capistrano.

Filifaes.—Revillagigedo (1793), Carta, quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 611, 1886. Filijayas.—Taylor in *Cal. Tilkuni (Tīlqūni). A Shahaptian tribe mentioned by Mooney as speaking the Tenino language and claiming the territory between Tygh and Warm Springs rs., in Wasco co., Oreg. They are now on Warm Springs res., Oreg., and are probably included under the official term Warm Springs Indians.

Tilhanne.—Lee and Frost, Oregon, 176, 1844. Tīlqūni.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 742, 1896.

Tillamook (Chinook: 'people of Neke-lim,' or Nehalem.—Boas). A large and prominent Salish tribe on Tillamook bay and the rivers flowing into it, in n. w. Oregon. According to Boas the culture of the Tillamook seems to have differed considerably from that of the n. coast Salish, and has evidently been influenced by the culture of the tribes of n. California. According to Lewis and Clark they occupied 8 villages, of which these explorers name 5: Chishuck, Chucktin, Kilerhurst, Kilberner, and Tower-quotton. The same authorities place the Tillamook population at 2,200. In the reports of the Wilkes Exploring Expedition (1845) their number is given as 400, and by Lane in 1849 as 200. See Boas, Traditions of the Tillamook Indians, Jour. Am. Folk-lore, xi, 23-38, 133-150, 1898.

Timigtac.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Timita.—Ibid. Titmictac.—Ibid.

Timpaiavats. A Ute division formerly occupying the valley of Utah lake, the Spanish Forks, and the adjacent mountains in Utah. They were said to number 300 in 1865, but had ceased to exist as a separate body before 1870. In 1873 Powell found 25 on the Uintah res., where they were known under the collective name of Uintah Utes.

Speaking of the Timpanogotzis (Tim-paiavats), who derived their name from Timpanogo, by which Utah lake was known to them, Fathers Dominguez and Escalante, in 1776 (Doc. Hist. Mex., 2^a s., i, 467, 1854), say: "On its shores dwell the aforementioned Indians, who live upon the abundant fish supplies of the lake, whence the Yutas Sabuaganas call them fish-eaters. Besides this, they gather on the plains seeds of plants, and make a sort of gruel with them, although they add to this the hunting of hares, rabbits, and sage-hens, of which there is a great abundance; there are also buffaloes not far to the eastward, but the fear of the Comanches prevents them from hunting them. Their dwellings are a sort of small huts of osiers, of which they make also baskets and other necessary utensils. Their dress manifests great poverty; the most decent which they wear is a coat or shirt of deerskin, and legging-moccasins of the same in winter; they have dresses made of hare and rabbit skins. They speak the Yuta language, but with a noticeable variation of accent, and even of some words. They are good featured, and mostly without beard."

Come Pescado.—Dominguez and Escalante (1776) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 2^a s., i, 467, 1854 ('fish-eaters': Spanish form of name given by the Sabuagana, or Akanagint). Fish-eaters.—Harry (1860) in Simpson, Rep. of Expl. Timpashauwagotsits (Tim-pa-shau'-wa-got-sits). A Paiute band near Providence mts., s. e. Cal.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 51, 1874.

Timucuan Family. A group of cognate tribes formerly occupying the greater part of N. Florida, extending along the E. coast from about lat. 28°, below C. Cañaveral, to above the mouth of St John r., and along the W. coast probably from Tampa bay northward to about Ocilla r., where they met the Apalachee, of Muskogean stock. The Hitchiti and Yamasee, also Muskogean, appear to have occupied their N. frontier nearly on the present state boundary; but the Timucua held both banks of St Marys r. and Cumberland id. S. of lat. 28° the W. coast was held by the Calusa, and the E. coast by the Ais and Tequesta, rude and fierce tribes, of whose language nothing is known, but who seem to have had no relation with the Timucuan tribes. The family designation is derived from the name of one of the principal tribes, the Timucua, Timagoa, Tomoco, or Atimuca, whose territory was about St Augustine and on middle St John r. The name may possibly signify 'lord' or 'ruler.' Other principal tribes were Saturiba on the lower St John; Yustaga, or Hostagua, about the upper Suwannee; Potano, W. of St John r., between the heads of the Withlacoochee and Suwannee; Tocobaga, between Withlacoochee r. and Tampa bay; Mayaca, on the n. e. coast; Marracou, 40 leagues from the mouth of St John r. Several other tribes can not be so definitely located, and all identification is rendered difficult owing to the confusion existing in the minds of the first explorers between chief names, tribe or village names, and titles. The statement, often repeated, that the chief had the same name as his "province" or tribe was due to misunderstanding. In person the Timucuan people are described as tall and well made. They went almost entirely naked except for the breechcloth, but covered their bodies with an elaborate tattooing. They were agricultural, though apparently not to the same extent as the Muskogean tribes, depending more on game, fish, oysters, wild fruits, and bread from the nourishing coonti root. Their larger towns were compactly built and stockaded, their houses being circular structures of poles thatched with palmetto leaves, with a large "townhouse" for tribal gatherings in the center of the public square. From misunderstanding of the description, Brinton and others following him have incorrectly described this townhouse as a communal dwelling. Society was based on the clan system, and Pareja (1612) gives an interesting account of the intricate system of kinship relations. The clans were grouped into phratries, usually bearing animal names, and certain chiefships or functions seem to have been hereditary in certain clans. In his time the system was retained even by the mission converts. In military organization and authority of the chiefs they seem to have surpassed the more northern tribes. Scalping and mutilation of the dead were universally practised, and human sacrifice was a regular part of their religious ritual, the victims, as among the Natchez, being sometimes infants belonging to the tribe. There is evidence also of occasional cannibalism. The narrative and descriptive illustrations of Le Moyne, the French Huguenot (1564), shed much light on the home life, war customs, and ceremonies, while from Pareja's confessional a good idea of their beliefs and religious practices is gained. All the dialects of the family seem to have been so closely related as to be mutually intelligible. Pareja names 7, viz: Freshwater District (probably on the interior lakes), Itafi, Mocama (a coast dialect), Potano, Santa Lucia de Acuera (s. from C. Cañaveral), Timacua, and Tukururu (on the Atlantic coast). Besides these there were probably others in the interior and on the w. coast. The language was vocalic and musical, with a very complex grammar.

The history of the Timucuan tribes begins with the landing of Ponce de León near the site of the present St Augustine in 1513. In 1528 Narvaez led his small army from Tampa bay northward to explore the country of the Apalachee and beyond. In 1539 De Soto went over nearly the same route, his historians mentioning some 20 tribal or local names within the region, including Yustaga and Potano. In 1562-64 the French Huguenots under Ribault and Laudonnière attempted settlements at the mouth of St John r., explored the middle course of the stream and the adjacent interior, and became acquainted with the tribes of Saturiba (Satouiroua) and Timucua (Thimagoa), as well as with the Potano (Potanou) and Yustaga (Hostaquia) already visited by De Soto. In 1565 the Spaniards under Menendez destroyed the French posts, killing all their defenders; they then founded St Augustine and began the permanent colonization of the country. Within a few years garrisons were established and missions founded, first under the Jesuits and later under the Franciscans. (See San Juan, San Mateo, San Pedro.) The principal center of mission enterprise was in the neighborhood of St Augustine among the Timucua proper. The most noted of these missionaries was Father Francisco Pareja, who arrived in 1594 and after 16 years of successful work retired to the City of Mexico, where he wrote a Timucua grammar, dictionary, and several devotional works, from which, and from the French narrative, is derived practically all that we know of the language, customs, beliefs, and organization of the Timucuan tribes. Pareja died in 1628. In spite of one or two revolts by which several missionaries lost their lives, the Timucuan tribes in general, particularly along the e. coast, accepted Christianity and civilization and became the allies of the Spaniards. In 1699 the Quaker Dickenson visited several of their mission settlements and noted the great contrast between the Christian Indians and the savage tribes of the southern peninsula among whom he had been a captive. A few years later, about 1703, began the series of invasions by the English of Carolina and their savage Indian allies, Creek, Catawba, and Yuchi, by which the missions were destroyed, hundreds of their people killed, and hundreds, possibly thousands, of others, men, women, and children, carried off into slavery, while the remnant took refuge close under the walls of St Augustine. The prosperous Apalachee missions shared the same fate. With the decline of the Spanish power and the incessant inroads of the Creeks and Seminole, the native Indians rapidly dwindled until on the transfer of the territory to the United States in 1821 only a handful remained, and these apparently belonging mostly to the uncivilized tribes of the southern end. It is possible that the remnant of the mission tribes had been later shipped to Cuba by the Spaniards, as had been the case with the Calusa in 1763.

Tinlin ('at the holes'). The Yokuts (Mariposan) name of the country about Tejon cr., Cal., occupied by the Shoshonean Gitanemuk (i. e., the Serranos of upper Tejon and Paso crs. in the San Joaquin valley drainage) and the Mariposan Yauelmani. Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., iii, 370, 1877) gives it, in the form Tinlinneh, as a tribal name. Cf. Pohal-lintinleh, Tejon.

Tinne (Tin'-ne, 'people'). The name sometimes given to the northern division of the Athapaskan family, comprising the Kaiyukhotana, Knaiakhotana, Ahtena, Kuilchana, Unakhotana, Kutchin, Kawchodinne, Thlingchadinne, Etchareottine, Chipewyan, Nahane, Sekani, Takulli, and Tsilkotin. They were divided by Petitot (Dict. Dènè-Dindjié, xx, 1893) into the following groups: I. Montagnais, comprising (1) Chipewyan proper, (2) Athabaskan, (3) Etheneldeli, (4) Tatsanottine. II. Montagnards, comprising (1) Tsattine, (2) Sarsi, (3) Sekani, (4) Nahane, (5) Etchareottine, (6) Esbataottine. III. Esclaves, comprising (1) Etchareottine, (2) Slaves proper, (3) Lintchanre, (4) Kawchodinne, (5) Ettagottine. IV. Dindjié, comprising (1) Kwitchakutchin, (2) Nakotchokutchin, (3) Tatlitkutchin, (4) Tukuthkutchin, (5) Vuntakutchin, (6) Hankutchin, (7) Ahtena, (8) Kutchakutchin, (9) Tengeratsekutchin, (10) Tenankutchin, (11) Unakhotana, (12) Knaiakhotana, (13) Koyukhotana. He classified them later (Antour du Lac des Esclaves, 361, 1893) as follows: I. Danè, vulgo Ingalihs, (1) Koyukukhotana, (2) Unakhotana, (3) Yukonikhotana, (4) Koyukhotana. II. Dindjié, vulgo Loucheux, (1) Tenankutchin, (2) Natsitkutchin, (3) Kutchakutchin, (4) Tengeratsekutchin, (5) Hankutchin, (6) Vuntakutchin, (7) Tukuthkutchin, (8) Tatlitkutchin, (9) Nakotchokutchin, (10) Kwitchakutchin. III. Dounié, vulgo Montagnais, (1) Ettagottine, (2) Klogeottine, (3) Krazlongottine. IV. Danè, (1) Nahane, (2) Esbataottine, (3) Sekani, (4) Tsattine, (5) Sarsi. V. Dènè, vulgo Hareskins, (1) Nelagottine, (2) Kawchodinne, (3) Thlingchadinne, (4) Kfwetrageottine, (5) Etatchogottine, (6) Nigottine. VI. Dènè Esclaves, vulgo Slaves, (1) Desneleyarelottine, (2) Eleidlingottine, (3) Etcheridieottine, (4) Etchareottine. VII. Dounè, vulgo Dogribs, (1) Tseottine, (2) Takfwelottine, (3) Tsantieottine, (4) Lintchanre. VIII. Dènè Chipewyan, (1) Tatsanottine, (2) Edjieretrukenade, (3) Desnelekenade, (4) Athabasca, (5) Etheneldeli, (6) Thilanottine. The Takulli and Tsilkotin as well as the Ahtena he classes with the Danè.

Morice divides the Tinne as follows: I. Western Dènès, (1) Tsilkotin, (2) Takulli, (3) Nahane. II. Intermediate Dènès, (1)

Sekani. III. Eastern Dénés, (1) Chipe-wyan, (2) Etheneldeli, (3) Tsattine, (4)
 Tatsanottine, (5) Thlingchadinne, (6)
 Etchareottine, (7) Ettchaottine, (8) Kawchodinne. IV. Northern Dénés, (1) Loucheux (Proc. Can. Inst., 113, 1889).

In Anthropos (I, 255-277, 1906) Father
 Morice makes the following classification, though the names here given are often quoted from other writers and are not always indorsed by him.—I. Loucheux, including the 'Kaiyuh-kho'-tenne, Koyūand Kwit'qakut'qin. II. The Subarctic

Dénés, including the Hares, Dog-Ribs, Slaves, and Yellow-Knives. III. Atha- baskans or Eastern Dénés, including the Cariboo Eaters, Athabaskans, and Chippewayans. IV. The Intermediate Dénés, including the Sheep Indians, Mountain Indians, Strong Bows, Nahanaïs, Beavers, Sarcis, and Sékanaïs. V. The Western
Dénés, including the Babines, Carriers,
 Chilcotins, and the Ts'ets'aut of Boas.
 See Athapascan Family.

Tintaotonwe (Tinta-otonwe, 'village on the prairie'). A former Mdewakanton Sioux band. The village was situated on lower Minnesota r. and was once the residence of Wabasha, the Kiyuksa chief, until he removed with most of his warriors, leaving a few families under his son, Takopepeshene, Dauntless, who became

Tioga (Iroquois: 'where it forks'). A former village situated on the site of Athens, on the right bank of the Susquehanna, near its junction with the Chemung, in Bradford co., Pa. The Iroquois settled here the Saponi, Tutelo, Nanticoke, Munsee, Mahican, and other fragmentary or conquered tribes living under their protection. It was the southern gateway to the country of the Iroquois, all of the great war-paths and hunting trails from the s. and s. w. centering here. Conrad Weiser passed through on his way to Onondaga in 1737. It was abandoned by the Indians in 1778, when they were preparing to retire before the Americans, and the deserted houses were burned by Col.
 Hartley on Sept. 27. A council was held here by Col. Thomas Pickering in 1790, when Farmer's Brothers (Fish Carrier) and Red Jacket were the chief speakers for the Indians. Col. Thomas Proctor passed through in 1791 when on his way to the council at Buffalo. In addition to Tionontati ('there the mountain stands.'—Hewitt). A tribe formerly living in the mountains s. of Nottawasaga bay, in Grey and Simcoe cos., Ont.

 They were first visited in 1616 by the French, who called them the Nation du Petun, or Tobacco Nation, from their having large fields of tobacco. In 1640 the Jesuits established a mission among them.
 The tribe then had 2 clans, the Deer and the Wolf, and 9 villages. On the destruction of the Huron tribes by the Iroquois, in 1648-49, many of the fugitives

took refuge with the Tionontati. This drew down upon the latter the anger of the Iroquois, who sent a strong force against them in Dec. 1649. Etarita, one of their principal villages, was surprised during the absence of the warriors, the houses burned, and many of the inhabitants, together with the missionary, massacred. The Tionontati, with the Hurons, who had joined them, now abandoned their country and fled to the region s. w. of L. Superior. In 1658 there were about 500 of the tribe at the Potawatomi mission of St Michel, near Green bay, Wis. Soon afterward they were with the Hurons at Shangawannikong (La Pointe), and about 1670 the two tribes were together at Mackinaw, at the entrance to L. Michigan. The Tionontati soon became blended with the Hurons, and the united tribes were henceforth known under the modernized name of Wyandot. As late, however, as 1721 the Tionontati, then living with the Hurons near Detroit, preserved their name and hereditary chieftaincies. They were frequently designated as Tionontati Hurons and have also been confounded with the Amikwa. Their villages, so far as their names are known, were Ehouae (St Pierre et St Paul), Ekarenniondi (St Matthieu), Etarita (St Jean), St Andre, St Barthelemy, St Jacques, St Jacques et St Philippe, St Simon et St Jude, St Thomas. Tiopane. A tribe, apparently distinct from the Copane, whom the name suggests, living in the 18th century between San Antonio, Texas, and the coast, a habitat close to that of the Copane. In 1733 they were mentioned as one of the tribes that sheltered the Espiritu Santo de Zúñiga mission from the Apache (Gov. Almazan in Autos sobre Providencias, Archivo Gen.). In 1737 they were referred to as the tribe that lived below the crossing of Guadalupe r., probably that between San Antonio and Espiritu Santo de Zúñiga (Complaints of Neophytes, in Archivo Gen., Misiones, xxi). Some of them were taken to the San Antonio missions, and in 1737 they, with the Pastia, fled, and Gov. Sandoval was unable to recover them (ibid.). (H. E. B.)

Sayupanes.—Almazan, Autos sobre Providencias, 1733, MS.

Tiopines. A Coahuiltecan tribe of Texas, identical with the Chayopines of García's Manual (1760). It seems that Tiopines was the earlier form of the name, because in 1754 a missionary at San Antonio asserted that the Tiopines "are now called Chayopines" (Arch. Col. Santa Cruz de Querétaro, K, leg. 4, no. 15, MS.). They may be identical with the Tiopanes (q. v.) or Sayupanes. The Tiopines were one of the "four large nations" which deserted the San José mission at San Antonio early in its career (Petition of Fray Santa Ana, 1750, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 140, MS.). Later they became one of the leading tribes at San Juan Capistrano mission. In 1737 they were there with the Tilojá, Orejon, Venado, and other tribes clearly Coahuiltecan. In 1738, 120 runaways of the tribe were recovered from the forest (Lamar Papers, no. 37, MS.). In 1768 they were mentioned as being on Rio Frio, but in 1780 the governor of Texas said their home was near the coast, E. of the Nueces (Cabello, Rep. on Coast Tribes, 1780, MS.). As late as 1780 they were still living at San Juan Capistrano mission (ibid.). (H. E. B.)

Tiosahron-dion (early Huron form, Te'o'chanontian (1653), probably cognate with Mohawk Tiio'sarroñ'nion', 'There where many (beaver) dams are': from initial prefix ti-, the transdirective sign, 'there', 'thither'; io-, the compound prefix pronoun of the third person, singular number, zoic gender, 'it-it'; -sar-, the nominal stem of o'sa'rá' or o'te'rá' (a dialectic variant) signifying 'a (beaver) dam'; -roñ, the verb-stem, '(to) place athwart,' and the adverbial suffix, -nion', 'many times', 'many places'). The present Iroquoian name of Detroit, Mich. There seems to be good evidence that the name did not originally belong to this spot. The Huron term, cited above, was first used in the Journal des Jésuites for 1653 (Jesuit Relations, Thwaites ed., xxxviii, 181, 1899) in conjunction with the place name Sken'chio'e, 'place of the foxes,' which was there represented to be "toward Te'o'chanontian," that is to say, "toward the place of the beaver-dams," meaning, evidently vaguely, in the beaver-hunting country. Inland on both sides of the strait connecting L. Huron with L. Erie there were noted beaver grounds, and their importance was so great in the 17th century that Lahontan marked the chief places on his map; there were also well-known beaver grounds lying between the Maumee and Wabash rs. In 1701 the Five Nations gave a deed of trust to the English King of their "beaver-hunting ground" (called Canagariarchio, i. e. Gana'garia'-Kontcerio, 'it beaver is fine'), a part of which land "runs till it butts upon the Twichtwicks [Miami]," comprising the "country where the beavers, the deers, elks, and such beasts keep and the place called Tieugsachron-die, alias Fort de Tret or Wawyachtenok" (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., iv, 908, 1854). At an early period the French realized the great importance of this strait, for it was the key to the three upper lakes and all their dependencies, and gave ready access to the Mississippi by way of Maumee r. and a portage of only 9 m. into the Wabash. So in 1686 Denonville (realizing that if this pass was held by the French, the English would be barred from the Mississippi and the great N. W., but if seized and held by the British, the Canadian fur-trade would be ruined) ordered Greysolon Du Luth to build a small picket fort, giving it the name Gratiot, which he occupied for a short time. In 1688 the Five Nations complained to Gov. Dongan, of New York, asking him to demolish the fort built two years previously. Later Cadillac proposed to establish there a permanent settlement and military post. In this proposal he met with strong opposition by those whose interests would be affected, and also by the Jesuits; finally, however, convincing the proper authorities of the feasibility of his plan and of the immense interests which it would conserve and protect, he began, on July 24, 1701, the picket Fort Pontchartrain, which was about 60 yds square and situated about 120 ft from the river.

In the same year the Five Nations complained that the Hurons had come to dwell at Tiosahron-dion and that they had thereby disturbed their beaver and elk hunting; they asserted that they had owned these hunting grounds for 60 (approximately 45) years, and that although the governors of New York and Canada had both admitted that these lands belonged to them, a fort had been built there by the French. To these remonstrances the French governor replied that the fort had been built for their sole benefit, for supplying them with powder and lead and other things needed in their hunting, and to prevent war between them and the Ottawa. At the same time the Hurons complained that the Missisauga (Waganhaes) had taken their beaver-hunting grounds and desired the French governor to remove the Missisauga to their own hunting lands. In 1700 they declared that this was "the only place of beaver hunting." In 1702, 24 "Farr Indians," probably Miami and Wyandot, informed the Five Nations that they had come to dwell at Tiosahron-dion, "at one end of your house." The French had previously ordered their Indian allies to make peace with the Five Nations. As early as 1727 many small tribes and parts of tribes, as the Wyandot, Miami, Foxes, Sauk, Ottawa, Missisauga and Potawatomi, had their villages in the vicinity of Tiosahron-dion. Ten years later 130 Shawnee warriors asked permission of the Governor of New York and of the Five Nations to go to dwell at Tiosahron-dion, because the Seneca and the Cayuga had sold their lands on the Susquehanna from under their feet.

Hennepin (New Discovery, 1697) says that L. Erie was called by the Iroquois Erigé Tejocharontiong, which signifies "At the place of the Erie people, there where many (beaver) dams are." (J. N. B. H.)

Tiou. A people on lower Mississippi and Yazoo rs., mentioned only during the earlier periods of French colonization in Louisiana. Tradition states that they were once very numerous, but that having been vanquished by the Chickasaw, they fled from their ancient seats, apparently on the upper Yazoo r., to the Natchez, who protected them and allowed them to form a distinct village. It is recorded in Margry (Déc., IV, 429, 1880) that the Bayougoula having prior to Mar. 1700 killed in a conflict all the Mugulasha within their reach, called in families of the Acolapissa and Tiou to occupy their deserted fields and lodges. In 1731, shortly after the Natchez uprising, they are said to have been cut off entirely by the Quapaw, and although this is doubtful, they are not heard of again. Du Pratz informs us that they possessed the r sound in their language. If this is true their language was not Muskogean proper, Natchez, or Siouan, but formed one group with Tunica, Koroa, Yazoo, and perhaps Grigra. (J. R. S.)

Tipi (from the Siouan root ti 'to dwell', pi 'used for'). The ordinary conical skin dwelling of the Plains tribes and of some of those living farther to the s. w. The tipi must be distinguished from the wigwam, wikiup, hogan, and other types of residence structures in use in other sections of the country.

The tipi consisted of a circular framework of poles brought together near the top and covered with dressed buffalo skins sewn to form a single piece, which was kept in place by means of wooden pins and ground pegs. It commonly had about 20 poles, averaging 25 ft in length, each pole being hewn from a stout sapling, usually cedar, trimmed down to the heart wood. The poles were set firmly in the ground so as to make a circle of about 15 ft in diameter, and were held together above by means of a hide rope wound around the whole bunch about 4 ft from the upper ends, leaving these ends projecting above the tipi covering. There were 3 main poles, or with some tribes 4, upon which the weight of the others rested. The cover consisted of from 15 to 18 dressed buffalo skins cut and fitted in such a way that, when sewn together with sinew thread, they formed a single large sheet of nearly semicircular shape. This was lifted into place against the framework by means of a special pole at the back of the structure, after which the two ends were brought around to the front and there fastened by means of 8 or 10 small wooden pins running upward from the doorway nearly to the crossing of the poles. The lower border was kept in place by means of pegs driven into the ground at a distance of about 2 ft apart around the circle. The doorway faced the E., the usual door being a piece of dressed skin stretched over a rectangular or elliptical frame, frequently decorated with porcupine quills or other ornaments. The dressed skin of a panther, coyote, or buffalo calf, with the hairy side outward, was sometimes used. The fire-pit was directly in the center, and the smoke escaped through the opening in the top, at the crossing of the poles. By means of movable skin flaps on each side of the smoke hole, the course of the smoke could be regulated as the wind shifted, the flaps being kept in place by 2 poles on the outside of the tipi. There were commonly 3 beds or seats, one at each side and one at the back of the tipi, each consisting of a long platform covered with a sort of mat of light willow rods, over which were thrown buffalo robes or blankets. The head end of the mat usually hung from a tripod in hammock fashion. Decorated curtains above the beds kept off the drops of water which came through the smoke hole in rainy weather. The ground was the floor, the part nearest the beds being sometimes cut off from the open space by means of a circular border of interwoven twigs. In warm weather the lower part of the tipi cover was raised to allow the breeze to pass through. In cold weather the open space around the bottom was chinked with grass. The tipi was renewed every one or two years, its completion being the occasion of a dedicatory ceremony, and those of prominent families decorated with heraldic paintings and other ornaments. On account of its exact adaptability to the necessities of prairie life, the tipi was taken by Gen. Sibley as the model for the tent which bears his name. Owing to the smaller number of ponies available for dragging the poles, the tipis of the northern tribes were usually fewer in proportion and larger in size than among the southern tribes. According to Grinnell, the Blackfeet in ancient times had a sort of large triple tipi, with 3 fireplaces. See Habitations, Skin and Skin-dressing. (J. M.)

TUPI DISE. AM. (DRA STANDARD): a Cover (average 18 to 20 buffalo hides). b Poles (average 20, besides 2 outside poles). c Two outside poles, or flap poles. d Flaps (for diverting draft and smoke). e "Ears" or pockets at top of flaps for inserting ends of outside poles. f Pins for pinning together the two sides of tipi cover (average 8, i. e., 2 below door and 6 above). g Pegs for holding edge of tipi cover to ground (average 20). h Door, usually a skin kept stretched by means of a transverse stick, or by a hoop frame. Inside, in the middle of the floor, is the fire-pit. There are names for special poles, for ornaments and other attachments, etc.

Tipitiwitchet. A former popular name for Dionæa muscipula, the Venus's fly-trap, or hog-eye, a North Carolina plant, now nearly extinct, noted for the extraordinary irritability of its leaves, which, when touched by an insect, collapse with a sudden spring and imprison the intruder. The word is from Renape (Virginia Algonquian) tītipwītshik, 'they (leaves) which wind around (or involve)'. (W. R. G.)

Tiposies. A hostile tribe, probably Moquelumnan, living N. and E. of San Joaquin r., among the foothills of the Sierra Nevada, on the headwaters of Tuolumne, Merced, and Mariposa rs., Cal.—Barbour et al. (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 61, 1853.

Tipoti. Mentioned by Oñate in 1598 (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 102, 1871) as a pueblo of New Mexico, in connection with others, apparently belonging to Keresan Indians.

Tipoy. An unidentified village visited by La Salle in 1686 on his first journey from Ft St Louis, on Matagorda bay, Texas, to search overland for the Mississippi. An Indian from the tribe guided him to the friendly Anami, whom he reached the following day. See Cavelier de la Salle in Shea, Early Voy., 40, 1861.

Tippecanoe (properly Kitapkwānūnk or Kitapkwānūnka, 'buffalo-fish place,' the Miami name for the stream at that point, from kitāpkwan, 'buffalo-fish.' The corresponding Potawatomi form, according to McCoy, is Kē-tāp'-ē-kōn. Trumbull's interpretation of 'at the great clearing' is probably based on a misconception of the Delaware form, which seems to contain the prefix kehti, 'great.'—J. P. Dunn). A noted village site on the W. bank of the Wabash, just below the mouth of Tippecanoe r., in Tippecanoe co., Ind. It was originally occupied by the Miami, the earliest known occupants of the region, and later by the Shawnee, who were in possession when it was attacked and destroyed by the Americans under Wilkinson in 1791, at which time it contained 120 houses. It was soon after rebuilt and occupied by the Potawatomi, and finally on their invitation became in 1808 the headquarters of Tecumseh and his brother, the Prophet, with their followers, whence the name Prophetstown. Their attitude becoming threatening, Gen. William Henry Harrison marched with 900 troops against the town, which was defended by about the same number of warriors recruited from all the neighboring tribes. When near the town, at daybreak of Nov. 7, 1811, his army was attacked by the Indians, under command of the Prophet, Tecumseh himself being then absent in the S. The desperate engagement that followed, known in history as the Battle of Tippecanoe, resulted in the complete defeat and dispersion of the Indians, with a loss on each side of from 50 to 60 killed and a very large proportion of wounded. The site was reoccupied for a short time a few years later. From this victory Harrison was properly and affectionately styled "Old Tippecanoe," and in his presidential campaign in 1848 a song with the refrain of "Tippecanoe and Tyler too" became the rallying cry of his supporters. Titymagg. A name used by the first English settlers in the Hudson bay country for the whitefish (Coregonus albus). Ellis (Voy. to Hudson's Bay, 185, 1748) says it was called by the French whitefish, but by the Indians and English tilymagg. This word is evidently a corruption of the Chippewa atikameg, in Cree atikkamek, 'caribou fish,' from atī'k, 'deer,' 'caribou,' and amek, 'fish.' In Rep. U. S. Fish Com., 1894, attihawhmeg is given as a name of the Labrador whitefish (C. Labrad.), another species. (A. F. C.)

Tiubta. A village of the Kalendaruk division of the Costanoan family, formerly connected with San Carlos mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Tiun (Ti'an). A Haida town of the Dostlan-Inagai family, formerly on the w. coast of Graham id., s. of Port Lewis, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. In the Skidegate dialect this is Ti'gan, which is said to mean 'Slaughter village.' It is probably the settlement referred to in John Work's list (1846) as "Too," with 10 houses and 196 inhabitants. It was one of the first places occurring in his list to be abandoned. (J. R. S.)

Ti'an.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 281, 1906.
Tian Ilngē.—Harrison in Proc. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 124, 1895. Ti'gan.—Swanton, op. cit.
Too.—Work (1846) in Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 4, 1859 (probably identical).

Tiveçocayo. Mentioned by Oviedo (Hist. Gen. Indies, III, 628, 1853) as one of the provinces or villages visited by Ayllon. The word owes its origin to a false division of two succeeding names which should read "Anicative [or rather Anicatiya], Çocayo." The first is unidentified; the second undoubtedly refers to the Coosa of South Carolina.

Tiyochoeli ('dungs in the lodge'). A modern Oglala Sioux band.

Tiyoçesli.—Dorsey (after Cleveland) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 221, 1897. Tiyotcesli.—Ibid.

Tkhlunkhastunne. A band of the Mishikhwutmetunne, who dwelt on Upper Coquille r., Oreg., next to the Kusan and below Coquille City.

Tqlūn-qas' ūnnē.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 232, 1890.

Tkimeye. A Kuitsh village at Winchester bay, near Umpqua r., Oreg.

Tki'-mi-ye.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 231, 1890.

Tktakai (T'k'takai, 'vine-maple'). A Squawmish village on the right bank of Squawmisht r., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Tkulmashaauk. A Yaquina village on the s. side of Yaquina r., Oreg.

T'kūl-ma'-ca-auk.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890.

Trwakwamish. A former Salish division on Puyallup r. and Vashon id., Wash.; pop. about 50 in 1853.

T'Kawkwamish.—Gibbs in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., I, 178, 1877. T'kwakwamish.—Gibbs quoted by Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., I, 241, 1877. T'Qua-quamish.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 435, 1855.

Trwuratum. Given as an Okinagan band at the mouth of Okinakane r., Wash. T'Kwuratum.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 412, 1855.

Tlaaluis (Laa'luis). One of the five original septes of the Lekwiltok, living on the coast of British Columbia between Bute and Loughborough inlets. After the great war between the Kwakiutl and the Salish they were so reduced in numbers that they joined the Kueha as another gens. (J. R. S.)

Ā-wā-oo.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 65, 1887. Olal-lu-i-is.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859. Laa'luis.—Boas in Rep. U. S. Nat. Mus. 1895, 332, 1897. Tlaaluis.—Boas in Petermanns Mitteil., pt. 5, 131, 1887.

Tlachtana ('weavers of grass mats'). A Knaiakhotana clan of Cook inlet, Alaska.—Richardson, Arct. Exped., I, 406, 1851.

Tlaiq (Tlāiq). A Wikenno village on Rivers inlet, Brit. Col.—Boas in Petermanns Mitteil., pt. 5, 130, 1887.

Tlakatlala (Lā'qalala). A Chinookan tribe formerly living on the n. bank of Columbia r. in Cowlitz co., Wash., about 3 m. above Oak Point.—Boas, Kathlamet Texts, 6, 1901.

Tlakaumoot (Tlak'aumō'ot). A division of the people of Nuskelst, a Bellacoola town.—Boas in 7th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 3, 1891.

Tlakluit (Ila'gluit, their own name, of unknown meaning). A Chinookan tribe formerly occupying the s. side of Columbia r. in Klickitat co., Wash., from about 6 m. above The Dalles down to the neighborhood of White Salmon r. They adjoined Shahaptian tribes on the e. and s., while the Chilluckittequaw, known also as White Salmon Indians, were their neighbors in the w. Their farthest point e. was a small island bearing a name meaning 'Atatahla's roasting place,' in allusion to a mythical incident; proceeding westward their villages were: Wayagwa; Wakemap; Wishram (properly called Nixlúidix'), about 5 m. above The Dalles; Shikeldaptikh, about ½ m. below; Shabanshksh, a mile below Wishram; Skukskhat; Wasnaniks; Niukhtash, at Big Eddy; Hliluseltshlikh; Gawishila, a fishing station; Chalaigtelit; Kwalsints, opposite The Dalles; Gawilapchk, a winter village; Nayakkhachikh, another winter village; Tsapkhadidlit, a wintering place; Shkonana, opposite Crate's Point; Shkagech; Hladakhat, about 10 m. below The Dalles; Shgwaliksh, about 2 m. below (perhaps a Klickitat village); Waginkhak, ½ m. below.

In 1806 Lewis and Clark estimated their number at 1,000. They participated in the Yakima treaty of 1855, but most of them have never gone on the Yakima reservation, although they are nominally under its jurisdiction. They are tribally, but not linguistically, distinct from the Wasco (q. v.). The tribe became notorious for the trouble they caused the early traders and settlers in making the portage at their principal village, Wishram. Their present number is about 150, some of whom live regularly in their fishing village of Wishram on the Columbia. About half this number are mixed bloods. See Sapir, Wishram Texts, Pub. Am. Ethnol. Soc., 11, 1909. (L. F. E. S.)
